Docket No. 6670: Maryland, Delaware & Virginia Railway Co. in re a line of 11 boats on Chesapeake Bay.

Docket No. 6708: Central Railroad of New Jersey in re Manhattan Lighterage Co. Operates various tugs, etc., in and around New York Harbor.

Docket No. 6605: Southern Pacific Co. in re Pacific Mail Steamship Co. Operates 17 steamers between San Francisco and Hawaii, Isthmus of Panama, and oriental points; also various tugs, lighters, launches, coal ships, etc.

Docket No. 6591: Southern Pacific Co., Central Pacific Railway Co., in re. Operates six boats on the Sacramento River.

Docket No. 6617: Spokane, Portland & Seattle Railway Co. in re Dalles, Portland & Astoria Navigation Co. Operates two boats between Portland, Oreg., and The Dalles, Oreg.

Docket No. 6634: Oregon-Washington Railroad & Navigation Co. Operates one boat between Megler, Wash., and Astoria, Oreg.; also three on the Willamette and Columbia Rivers and two on the Snake River; also one ferryboat on Lake Coeur d'Alene.

Docket No. 6648: Southern Pacific Co. and Central Pacific Railway Co. in re Sacramento Transportation Co. Boats on the Sacramento River. (Note.—Petition does not state number of boats.)

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, since the dawn of civilization the governments of the earth have been fighting the battles of commerce. Expanding commerce has always been recognized as one of the essentials for the permanent prosperity of the people, and the development of commerce has received the fostering care of all great governments the world over. Transportation is the key that unlocks the gates of commerce. Cheap transportation facilitates commerce. Unreasonable charges for transportation have often destroyed commerce. The policy pursued by our great Government from the beginning has been in favor of cutting down the barriers that stood in the way of cheap transportation and the opening of the doors to a ready exchange of commodities between our several States and between this country and foreign nations. The Democratic convention that met in Baltimore and named Woodrow Wilson for President and Thomas R. Marshall for Vice President on the 2d day of July, 1912, promulgated the platform of the national Democratic Party, and made the following declaration in reference to the tolls of American ships passing through the Panama Canal:

We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal. We also favor legislation forbidding the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned or controlled by railroad carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal.

There can be no contention as to the meaning of this language. No one can raise the issue that the bill now pending before the House, introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], is not in direct conflict with the declaration of the Democratic platform. [Applause.] Personally, I believe that the party pledge should be lived up to in good faith by those who claim allegiance to party principles. [Applause.] But as there are many here who differ with me in reference to the binding effect of a party platform, I will not at this time endeavor to discuss the pending bill from that standpoint.

Let us resolve the issue into the question as to whether the platform of the Democratic Party favoring exemption of tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal is best for the Nation and the people of our country, or whether the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], in the bill now pending before the House repudiating the declaration of the Democratic Party, is proposing legislation that will be most beneficial to our Nation and our people. Let me briefly call to your attention some facts that you know, but which should be made a part of the record in this debate. First, the Panama Canal when complete will have cost the American people in the neighborhood of $375,000,000. We have issued bonds to the amount of $134,631,980; $84,631,980 bear interest at the rate of 2 per cent, and the balance at the rate of 3 per cent. The expenditures above the amount of the bonds sold were paid in cash out of the Treasury. It is fair to estimate that 3¼ per cent of the entire cost of the canal no more than meets the interest and a fair sinking-fund requirement. This annual charge on the $375,000,000 investment will be $12,187,500. The cost to operate and maintain the Suez Canal for 1910 was $3,875,405. Assuming that the cost of operation and maintenance at Panama will be about the same as that at Suez, then the annual charge to meet interest, sinking-fund requirements, cost of operation, and maintenance of the Panama Canal would be about $16,045,000. President Taft employed Prof. Emory R. Johnson, at a salary of $1,000 a month and expenses, to estimate the probable traffic through the Panama Canal and report on a fair rate of tolls to be charged. Prof. Johnson estimated that the total shipping that would utilize the canal by 1915 would amount to 10,500,000 net tons, and that but 1,160,000 net tons would be coast-to-coast traffic, which amounts to 11 per cent of the total estimated tonnage going through the canal next year. If the law remains as it is to-day, there will be about 9,340,000 net tons of traffic on which tolls will be collected; and as the rate of tolls fixed by the proclamation of President Taft amounts to $1.20 per net ton, the annual revenue for next year would amount to $11,208,000, without making any charge whatever on coast-to-coast vessels. Deducting $4,000,000 for the cost of operation and maintenance, will leave over $7,000,000 to meet the interest charges on money expended, which amounts to nearly 2 per cent. As the tonnage through the Panama Canal will unquestionably increase in the future, we can expect within the near future to receive the cost of operation and maintenance, together with at least a 3 per cent return on our investment, without levying any charge whatever on our coast-to-coast ships.

Now, let us see what treatment the ships of the world receive at the Suez Canal. This canal is owned by a stock company and is under the virtual control of the British Government, which since 1875 has owned 176,602 of the 379,421 shares of the capital stock, acquired at a cost of $19,855,320. The Suez Canal was opened in 1869. It is 103 miles long and 17 hours are required for passage through it, as against 54 miles at Panama and a passage through it of less than 12 hours. The present depth of the Suez Canal is 28 feet, as against 41 feet of water in the Panama Canal. During 1910 the Suez Canal handled 4,533 vessels having a total tonnage of 16,581,898 net tons, for which service the canal company received $25,168,400. The cost of operation and maintenance was $3,857,405; payment for fixed charges and for retiring capital obligations amounted to $6,072,602, the company earning net profits for 1910 of $15,908,419, paying a dividend of 31.6 per cent to its stockholders. Up to the end of the year 1910 the expenditures on the Suez Canal had amounted to $126,642,406 and the outstanding capital obligations amounted to only $92,484,544. The tolls charged on the Suez Canal are now $1.30 per net ton on ships with cargo and 82 cents per ton on ships in ballast, and a charge of $1.93 each for passengers older than 12½ years of age.

I make this comparison to show the absolute fairness with which we have treated British and other foreign vessels in the way of toll charges as compared with the treatment that our own ships receive in the Suez Canal. We charge $1.20 per net ton, as compared to the British charge at Suez of $1.30 per net ton. Our canal cost $375,000,000, as compared to the cash expenditures at the Suez Canal of less than $127,000,000. We give better service, passing a ship through in less than 12 hours, as compared to 17 hours on the Suez Canal. The present depth of the Suez Canal is 28 feet, as compared to 41 feet in the Panama Canal.

The distance saved by ships going through the Panama Canal from New York to Pacific ports north of Panama is 8,000 miles. From New York to ports of the west coast of South America is 5,000 miles. From Europe to Pacific ports in North America is 6,000 miles; in South America, 2,600 miles.

The purpose of Congress in providing in the act for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the canal "that no tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States," and providing, further, that it should be left discretionary with the President of the United States to exempt from tolls our ships engaged in foreign trade, was an effort on the part of Congress to discriminate in favor of American shipping and to reestablish our merchant marine. [Applause.] This has been a policy of the Democratic Party since the beginning of the Government. The Democratic Party has never stood for direct subsidies, but has always favored subventions and discriminations in favor of our shipping. It was through discriminating tariff duties that our merchant marine was developed in the first three decades of our Government's existence. The Democratic tariff law that is now on the statute books carries in it a discrimination amounting to a reduction of 5 per cent of the duties on goods imported in American ships. If we have built the canal for the benefit of an American merchant marine and not for the practical exclusive use of foreign shipping, we must adopt a policy of discrimination in favor of American ships or we must in the end pay indirect subsidies to enable our ships to compete with ships of foreign nations. The subsidies and discriminations that European governments have given to their shipping interests have practically driven American ships from the seas. American ships carried only $280,206,464, or 8.7 per cent, of the total sea-borne commerce of our country, which amounted for the year 1911 to $3,210,642,970. Our ships for that year earned about $11,500,000, and we paid the foreigners for carrying our freight about $135,000,000. In 1870 American ships carried about 35 per cent of the total import and export trade of the country. To-day they carry less than 9 per cent.

The cost of operating American ships is greater than that of foreign rivals, as shown by the report of a congressional committee made some years ago. According to that report, salary and wage cost for a month was as follows: The St. Louis—American—$11,306, or 97 cents per gross ton; Oceanic—British—$9,891, or 57 cents per gross ton; Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, $7,716, or 54 cents per gross ton.

A comparison of the bounties and subsidies paid by the United States and foreign countries shows the impossibility of our developing a merchant marine under present conditions. For the year 1911 the United States Government paid to American ships $1,074,945 and to foreign ships $2,129,654 for carrying our mail. That year Great Britain paid in bounties and subsidies $9,700,000 and France $13,425,000. Japan paid in 1909, $6,183,000 and the total amount paid by all foreign Governments for the year 1911 amounted to over $46,000,000.

Let us examine the policy pursued by foreign Governments as to their ships going through the Suez Canal. Great Britain pays the Peninsular & Oriental Steamboat Co. direct subsidies which amounted for the year 1910 to $1,485,000, nearly enough to pay the toll charges the ships of that company have to pay going through the Suez Canal. Germany paid the North German Lloyd Co., in 1910, $1,385,000, which was sufficient to pay the Suez tolls. France paid the three French lines going through the Suez Canal $2,145,000, which paid their tolls three times over. Japan paid her ship lines going through the Suez Canal, for 1900, $1,336,000, which was two and a half times the tolls; and Russia paid the canal tolls on her ships going through the Suez Canal.

Already Spain and Russia have passed laws and made appropriations to pay their ships going through the Panama Canal the amount of the tolls. There can be no question that Germany, France, and England will pursue the same policy in reference to the Panama Canal that they have always pursued in reference to the Suez Canal and grant to their ships going through the canal bounties and subsidies to the amount at least equal to the tolls that are being paid, and yet to-day we are asked to acknowledge to the world that we can not discriminate in favor of our own ships without a breach of faith with foreign nations and must in the end, if this bill becomes a law, abandon the Democratic doctrine of discrimination in favor of American ships and at the same time abandon American ships and be content to let the future commerce of our country be carried in foreign bottoms or adopt a system of indirect subsidies, which are not only more costly and less effective than discriminating canal tolls, but are in direct conflict with the principles for which the party now in power has always contended.

After you have written this bill in the statute book, do you propose to maintain the canal solely for the benefit of foreign ships or do you propose to turn the country over to a Government that will subsidize American ships, so that they may have an opportunity to compete in the carrying trade through the canal? [Applause.]

For the reasons given above, I believe that the Democratic Party was both wise and patriotic when it announced a policy in favor of discriminating in favor of our coastwise ships going through the Panama Canal, and that there is no reason at this time why we should abandon a solemn promise made to the American people in one of the most prominent planks in our party platform; but we are told that we are violating a solemn treaty made with another nation, and in good faith that we should abandon the canal to foreign rivals without contest or dispute in order that we may keep our standing in the family of nations. Not for one moment do I believe that we have violated a treaty right, and not for one moment do I believe that the English Government seriously contends that we have violated a treaty right. Our whole difficulty in the matter arises from the un-American spirit of surrender that some of our own people have exhibited toward this important question from the very beginning. [Applause.] If the Congress had unanimously passed the canal tolls bill two years ago, I do not believe that the question would have ever been raised that we do not have the right to exempt American ships from the payment of tolls when we charge foreign ships a fair and equitable rate for their passage through the canal. Great Britain charges $1.30 for the passage through a canal that cost only one-third of what it cost us to build the Panama Canal, and our toll charge is only $1.20 per net ton. It seems to me clear that it does not lie within the mouth of Great Britain or any foreign nation to complain that we have not given them fair and equitable treatment in the tolls that we have charged for the passage of their ships through the canal. In fact, the letter of the Hon. A. Mitchell Innes, chargé d'affaires, written to the Secretary of State, Hon. P. C. Knox, on July 8, 1912, practically admits that the exemption of our coast-to-coast vessels from toll charges is not in conflict with the treaty made by Great Britain and the United States in reference to the canal. [Applause.] In concluding his letter he says:

> As to the proposal that exemption shall be given to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, a more difficult question arises. If the trade could be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic which is reserved for United States vessels would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken.

[Applause.]

That letter does not sound like a contention on the part of Great Britain at the time the law was enacted that we were violating a treaty with her.

Article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty reads as follows:

> The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say:
> 1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.
> 2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.
> 3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.
> Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.
> 4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

It must be borne in mind that under the law that was on the statute books when this treaty was made that no foreign ships could engage in our coastwise trade. Therefore, the giving of tolls to ships engaged in the coastwise trade could not be a discrimination against the English ships unless it amounted to a charge for traffic that would be unjust and inequitable.

In this connection I desire to call to your attention a statement made by the Hon. Chandler P. Anderson, who was the counselor for the State Department in the Taft administration:

> In reply to the first objection—that under the act no tolls are to be levied upon ships engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States—the position taken by the Government of the United States was that, in view of the fact that no foreign vessels were permitted to engage in the coastwise trade of the United States, an exemption of American vessels engaged in that trade was in no sense a discrimination against foreign vessels so long as this exemption was restricted to bona fide coastwise trade. Great Britain has admitted that the United States is at liberty to grant a subsidy to its vessels whether engaged in coastwise or foreign trade, and apparently has admitted in principle that a subsidy may be granted indirectly by an exemption from the payment of tolls if that should be done without producing an increase in the rate of tolls imposed upon British vessels; but it is contended by Great Britain that "if any classes of vessels are exempted from tolls in such a way that no receipts from such ships are taken into account in the income of the canal there is no guaranty that the vessels upon which tolls are being levied are not being made to bear more than their fair share of the upkeep." In making this contention the British Government apparently was under the impression that the President, in determining the rate of tolls, would not take into account the tonnage of American coastwise vessels, and therefore that the toll rate would be higher than if those vessels were subjected to the payment of tolls. That the British Government was under a misapprehension with regard to this matter has been clearly shown by the reply of the United States, which pointed out that "the tolls which would be paid by American coastwise vessels, but for the exemption contained in the act, were computed in determining the rate fixed by the President," and the figures are given showing that the estimated net tonnage upon which the tolls fixed in the President's proclamation were based included the tonnage of American coastwise vessels. For these reasons the Government of the United States contended that there had as yet been no discrimination, and that there was nothing in the situation to show that the United States intended to discriminate against British vessels, either by subjecting them to inequality of treatment or by imposing upon them unjust and inequitable tolls.
> From the foregoing brief outline of the issues and arguments presented in the diplomatic discussion of this controversy it will be seen that it is still an open question as to whether the two Governments can not harmoniously settle their differences with regard to this treaty without resorting to arbitration. Great Britain has proposed arbitration, and the United States has not as yet accepted that suggestion; but it has not refused to do so, having taken the position that the issues between the two countries should first be more clearly defined, and that arbitration at present would be premature, because the controversy has not yet passed beyond the stage when it could profitably be dealt with by diplomatic negotiation.

[Applause.]

Great Britain proposed to arbitrate the question, but the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] proposes to surrender all our rights without a fight. [Applause.]

From the statement of Mr. Anderson it will be seen that President Taft in fixing the amount of the tolls made an allowance for the exemption from tolls of coastwise vessels, and it clearly does not become the British Government to contend that our charges discriminate against her shipping or are unjust and inequitable when we consider that the charges collected at the Suez Canal, under her management, for the year 1911 not only paid the cost of maintenance and operation, but returned a net dividend of over 31 per cent, whereas the charges proposed by us at Panama, after paying the cost of maintenance and operation, will return us a net dividend of not quite 2 per cent.

There is a more serious question involved in the passage of this bill.

The right to discriminate in favor of our ships, the opportunity to encourage our shipping, and to increase our commerce are matters of vital importance, but they pale into insignificance when compared with the attack on the sovereignty of our country in the Canal Zone. [Applause.]

We are told by those in favor of the pending bill that when the Hay-Pauncefote treaty used the words—

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality—we are prevented from preferring our own vessels of commerce.

But if the language applied to vessels of commerce, it must apply to vessels of war.

It is manifest that under this claim of the treaty we can not exclude vessels of war and include vessels of commerce under our flag unless the words "all nations" means all nations other than ourselves, as it manifestly does. [Applause.]

The power to build the canal, under our Constitution, rests in the war power of the United States. We built the canal primarily as an addition to our war power, as it permits the quicker transfer of our naval forces from one ocean to another. Its inland lake provides a harbor of refuge in which our navies can rendezvous and, as occasion offers, strike at either ocean.

The advocates of Great Britain's claim take the position that we are forbidden to discriminate in favor of our own vessels of commerce, and as vessels of commerce and war are named together, how long will it be before the same advocate of the British contention will advise us that we can not discriminate in favor of our own war vessels.

When you read sections 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 together, if no discrimination can be made in favor of our war vessels we will be compelled to recognize the contention that if during war with a foreign power we find an enemy's man-of-war in the canal we can not drive it out, and if it leaves we must wait 24 hours before giving chase. If engaged in war, our own ships must chase themselves out of the canal in 24 hours.

The contention of those advocating the British claim seems almost absurd when we recognize that if we admit them for vessels of commerce the same reasoning will require us to admit them for vessels of war.

To do so would convert the canal in time of war into a liability instead of an asset. [Applause.]

Of course we made no such contract. We give to all nations observing certain rules adopted by us certain privileges in the canal. That did not mean that we proposed to build a canal at our own expense and then surrender its sovereignty to all other nations.

Let me read the strong and unambiguous article 2 of the treaty, which says:

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations or through subscriptions to or purchasers of stock or shares and that, subject to the provision of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all rights incident to construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

We have contracted in article 3 not to use the canal to favor the fortunes of any particular belligerent by an adoption of rules of neutrality to be applied by and to other nations as the condition under which we allow them to use the canal.

But, aside from the obligation of neutrality, we have in article 2 full freedom of action. There is nothing to prevent our making reciprocal concessions to other nations. This has been recognized by our Government and conceded without protest by Great Britain, for the Hay-Bunau-Varilla treaty extended special privileges to Panama by granting its ships free tolls. [Applause.]

There is no word that even by implication denies our right to give free tolls to our vessels in any trade, and the day will yet come when we will free our vessels from tolls in the foreign trade. [Applause.]

But we have yet to consider the most serious surrender that the advocates of the British contentions desire to make—that is, to make the admission that we are not sovereign in the Canal Zone. [Applause.]

The report, No. 362, of the majority of the committee, on page 7, makes the damaging admission, which I will read:

So instead of being an American waterway to be opened as a gratuity to the world in conformity to our local policy as to rivers and harbors, the Panama Canal is by these binding treaties an international waterway, to be operated under the terms of these treaties with equal treatment to the people and subjects of all nations, it being a foreign country and constructed by the consent of other nations, under binding covenant, that runs with the enterprise.

By your vote you are asked to ratify for all time to come the British desire that we surrender sovereignty of the Canal Zone and admit that it is an international waterway in which we have no rights that are not possessed by all other nations.

The statement made by the majority of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is manifestly unsound and without the warrant of a single fact behind it. [Applause.]

Our governmental status on the Canal Zone was established and fixed by a treaty made with the Republic of Panama subsequent to the making of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Great Britain remained silent after the publications of this treaty and allowed us to build the canal under it, and she is estopped now to deny the right we acquired under this treaty with Panama. [Applause.]

I will read article 3 of the treaty.

The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the rights, power, and authority within the zone mentioned and described in article 2 of this agreement and within the limits of all auxiliary lands and water mentioned and described in said article 2 which the United States would possess and exercise if it were sovereign of the territory within which said lands and water are located to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any sovereign rights, power, or authority.

[Applause.]

The Republic of Panama acquired the sovereignty over the land through which the canal was built, in the same manner the original thirteen States of this Union acquired their sovereignty, by successful revolution. [Applause.]

Panama has surrendered her sovereignty over the Canal Zone to our Government by language that is so clear it can not be misunderstood.

Are we now to yield the sovereign rights of a Nation, and for what? Can anyone tell us plainly why we surrender, and what is to be accomplished by it?

Are we to yield merely because the sentiment of Europe is against us? When has the sentiment of Europe ever been with us about matters of moment?

Was Europe with us when we protested against the British Government taxing us without granting representation in the Parliament?

Did Europe sympathize with us when we protested against the unlawful seizures and search of vessels in the second decade of the last century?

When will the time ever come when we can expect to maintain and preserve our rights, political and commercial, with the acquiescent sympathy of European Governments? [Loud Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD submitted the following as an appendix:

[From the New York American, March 1, 1914.]

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS, BY HON. O. W. UNDERWOOD.

The importance of a merchant marine to our country was clearly expressed by Thomas Jefferson, then Secretary of State under George Washington in 1791, when he said that "the marketing of our products will be at the mercy of any nation which has possessed itself exclusively of the means of carrying them, and our politics may be influenced by those who command our commerce."

This statement, made more than 120 years ago, is prophetic of our present condition. Foreign governments are almost exclusively possessed of our foreign carrying trade, and, to a large extent, the arrangement of their shipping routes has excluded our commerce from the markets of South America, and will continue to do so as long as present conditions remain.

No question outranked in importance the fostering care of our commerce in the first Congresses of the United States. The building of American ships and the development of our foreign commerce for years has been discussed from many and varied standpoints. When we consider the building up of the American merchant marine we naturally ask the question, Is it worth while? And if it is worth while, what are the benefits to be obtained?

THE VITAL FACTS IN THE CASE.

Almost before the dawn of civilization nations were fighting for trade, and it has always been recognized that a favorable balance of trade was a vital factor in the commercial life of nations, to be contended for by all. A country may maintain the balance of commerce in its favor by its export of commodities produced at home, either agricultural or manufacturing, or it may maintain a balance in its favor by reason of the work done by it for other nations.

England, Norway, Germany, and France are great carriers of commerce for others than themselves. They often have an adverse balance of trade against them amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars, but as great as this adverse balance of trade is, they easily pay it by carrying in their ships the products of other nations. Without their earnings from their ships they could not for any length of time continue their present excessive importation of commodities from other lands.

WE HAVE ALWAYS CONTENDED FOR COMMERCE.

Transportation must be balanced as well as trade, either by trade, by transportation, or by the exchange of precious metals, securities, or investments. It has been recognized universally that a country that settles its balance of commerce in gold must ultimately become a decadent nation, poorer and poorer as the years go by.

Our early statesmen, recognizing this fact, contended for fair commerce between the Colonies and foreign nations. Benjamin Franklin stated:

"Fair commerce is where equal values are exchanged for equal, the expenses of transportation included. Thus, if it cost A in England as much labor and charge to raise a bushel of wheat as it cost B in France to produce 4 gallons of wine, then are 4 gallons of wine the fair exchange for a bushel of wheat, A and B meeting at half distance with their commodities to make the exchange. The advantage of this commerce is that each party increases the number of his enjoyments, having instead of wheat alone and wine alone the use of both wheat and wine."

The balance of commerce in its trade relation with other countries is largely the determining factor in the life of a nation, that ascertains whether it shall be rich or poor, weak or strong, dependent or independent. Shipless trading nations are constantly in foreign debt and often in financial straits.

The preponderance of exports over imports may fix the balance of trade in a nation's favor; nevertheless, if some other nation is carrying its commerce, the cost of transportation being paid to the foreigner, the balance of commerce often is left in favor of the foreign nation, and must be paid in gold or its equivalent.

Let us not forget that commerce consists of transportation as well as trade. The freight charge becomes a part of the value of the cargo; whether it is credited to the side of the imports or the exports depends on whether the ship is foreign or domestic. Our own ships carrying goods abroad increase our credit there; our own ships bringing goods home save in debt here. It is of equal importance that the charge for transportation should be equally balanced as that the trade balance should be in our favor.

It was with these considerations in mind and with a desire to solve the great problems of trade and commerce in favor of the American citizen that induced those who earnestly desired the development of our great country to vote for the provisions in the Panama Canal bill that exempted American coastwise ships from the payment of tolls in passing through the Panama Canal.

WHY IT WAS PASSED.

The opponents of the measure proclaimed the exemptions from tolls a subsidy, and they did so regardless of the fact that all the civilized nations of the world are discriminating in favor of their commerce, and that from the beginning of our Government the policy of the American Nation has been to foster and develop our commerce, both foreign and domestic. We built a macadamized road from Maryland to the Mississippi River to foster commerce and to give an outlet for the products of the soil in the Mississippi Valley to the eastern seaboard.

We have spent millions of dollars in opening our harbors, improving our rivers, and building canals to facilitate commerce, and the Federal Government has borne the burden without cost to the individual shipper.

The Sault Ste. Marie Canal, on the Great Lakes, has been built and maintained at Government expense. The locks and dams on our navigable rivers have been built and maintained at Government expense, all in the interest of promoting commerce.

NO REAL DIFFERENCE.

I can see no real distinction between a ship loaded at Duluth with wheat going through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal without lockage charges and landing its cargo at Buffalo, or a barge loaded with coal starting at Pittsburgh, going through the canal and locks on the Ohio River and unloading its freight at New Orleans, and a ship starting with American merchandise from the port of San Francisco, going through the Panama Canal free of tolls and landing its cargo at New Orleans or New York.

If one is equitable and just, the other is. If one is fair and honest, the other is. If one is in the interest of American people, the other is. If one is a subsidy or subvention, the other is. If one is in violation of our principles of government, the other is.

Is there a man in business on the Great Lakes or in our inland waterways who desires the Government of the United States to abandon its time-honored policy of promoting commerce and in favor of the levy of tolls on American ships coming through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, or steamboats and barges plying our inland rivers? If not, why should a tax be levied on our domestic commerce moving from ocean to ocean?

THE RIGHTS OF THE PEOPLE.

Have not the people who live and do business in the States bordering on the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans and the Gulf of Mexico the same rights and are they not entitled to the same treatment that is accorded the people living in States bordering on the Great Lakes or the inland rivers of our country? If it is right to promote commerce in these instances, is it not equally right to promote it in the other?

They say that to exclude American coastwise ships from the payment of tolls for passing through the Panama Canal is in violation of our treaty rights; that we agreed not to discriminate against foreign ships in the payment of tolls.

If we discriminate against foreign ships at all, it is clear that we do so in prohibiting a foreign ship from carrying the domestic commerce from an American port to an American port, but as we do prohibit foreign ships from participating in our coastwise trade it seems to me clear that there is no discrimination in granting tolls to ships exclusively engaged in a trade that foreign ships are prohibited from participating in.

I realize, of course, that we may spin arguments and go far afield to search for theories to sustain the position that we have violated a treaty right. But when you come to the real meat of the question, leaving out the technicalities, it seems clear to me that when we charge tolls to American ships engaged in foreign commerce on the same basis as foreign ships engaged in the same commerce and only exempt those ships that had no foreign competitors, that we live up to the true spirit of the treaty rights of all nations.

But assuming that there may be a doubt as to whether we are violating a solemn treaty made with a foreign nation or not, there is certainly more doubt in our favor than in favor of the foreigner, and it does not appear to me that we should tamely surrender a great economic principle beneficial to all the American people without at least a fair contest for our rights.

If there is doubt and serious doubt, the matter can be submitted to arbitration. If the court finds a verdict against us, we can accept the results and live up to the findings of the court, but for my part I see no reason why we should surrender the American citizen's rights as to a question that, to say the least, is unsettled until it has been decided against us.

I do not feel that there is a nation in Europe that would surrender as important a question as the development of its commerce without at least insisting on a court of arbitration.

And, in my judgment, it will be a great mistake for our Government to surrender at this time what may have a lasting effect on the development of the trade and commerce of our Nation in the future.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER].

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and I look at this question from points of view which are so wide apart that we can not even find common ground on which the subject ought to be debated. We can not agree even on what are the questions involved in the proposition now before the House. In the years that I have been a Member of this House I believe this is the first proposition of any moment in which I have found myself differing in view from the distinguished gentleman whom I have been proud from the beginning to call my leader upon this floor, and I admit that I am unaffectedly embarrassed in being put into a position in this debate where it might be expected that what I shall have to say is designed as a reply to him whom I have followed ever since I have been in the House.

I have said many times in private and in public—and I repeat it now—that no single factor has operated so greatly to the wonderful success with which the present administration has been so far crowned as the hearty and close cooperation which at all times has been had between those two great leaders of our party, Mr. UNDERWOOD and President Wilson. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I can voice the regret which I am sure every Member of this House who proposes to vote for this repeal feels in his heart that at this crisis in our party's history, at the time when a measure is up fraught with so much danger, if it should be lost, to the prestige of this great administration, we find this leader upon whom we have relied forsaking what he himself has taught the necessity of—cooperation between leaders in the party for the accomplishment of the general good of the party and the country. The gentleman from Alabama has broad shoulders and can carry heavy burdens, but I venture to say that as the years go by he will be able to convince himself that he has never carried a burden more heavy than when he undertakes to lift and carry the load of insurrection within the party which has honored him against the efficient leadership which has made it possible for our party to write a record of achievement in the first year of this administration unparalleled in the history of the country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Of course, the gentleman from Alabama said this morning that he regretted that he must differ with the President. He makes no attack upon the President or his policy except by shadowy innuendo and intimation. He is too good a Democrat; he is of too sweet and kindly a disposition and too great a character even to share in small degree the criticism and attack which gentlemen upon the other side of the House have made and will freely make against the head of this administration; but I could not help feeling as he made his remarks this morning and again this afternoon, as he received the tumultuous applause of the historic enemies of the party which is now in power, that he was very much like an old Quaker ancestor of mine who, like the gentleman from Alabama, was of kind and sweet disposition and great gentleness of character. He was at one time bitten by a mad dog. He said to the dog, "If I were not a Quaker, if I did not believe in peace and gentleness, I would kill thee; but since I do believe in these things and can not be rude or cruel I will simply call thee a bad name." So he went down the street shouting "Mad dog," and other persons, without his sweetness of disposition and kindliness of character, attended to the dog. [Laughter.] I know the gentleman from Alabama makes no attack upon his party's chief. He makes no fight against the administration's policy. He just contents himself with making a few remarks which give hope and cheer to the enemies of the party in power and make them believe that with reenforcements such as they have to-day they may split us wide open so that we will be deprived of the opportunity to give this country the blessings to which it is entitled and which it will receive if the party remains in power. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

When the Panama Canal act was before the last Congress, those Members who opposed the exemption of American coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls did so for two reasons: They believed it to be a subsidy to the shipping interests, and they construed it as a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty defining the rights of the nations with respect to the use of the canal. Upon these propositions reasoning men might easily differ. Equally patriotic statesmen contended that it was not a subsidy but a mere subvention in the interest of building up an American merchant marine; that it was a discrimination in favor of our own shipping for which example, if not justification, might be found in similar discriminations by other Governments in favor of their own shipping interests. Equally able international lawyers contended that it was no violation of treaty obligations and, as a domestic matter, was beyond the purview of the treaty in question.

A majority of both Houses of Congress resolved these doubts and differences in favor of the exemption, and it was written into law. Of course, as one of those who originally opposed the exemption, I do not have to search my mind to find reasons to support the view that the exemption of American coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls through the canal is unsound in law and wrong in economic principle. I convinced myself then, and I am no less convinced now. Having a reasonably clear understanding of the plain meaning of English words, I can not see how any other man with like understanding can bring his mind to believe that free passage for the citizens of one nation is no discrimination against the citizens or subjects of other nations subjected to the payment of tolls.

I am equally clear that whether it be called a subsidy, subvention, or bounty, the exemption constitutes such a privilege to one small class of our people as to make it offensive to true Democratic doctrine. What is it we originally proposed to do? Either that we should collect at the Isthmus tolls sufficient to pay the expense of operating and maintaining the canal and its fixed charges or we should collect a less amount. We did not propose to make money out of it. If we now propose to compel ships using the canal to pay tolls sufficient to cover these operating and other expenses, then if we exempt a part of the ships from the payment of tolls, we manifestly place upon the ships which do pay not only their own share but the share of the ships which do not pay. It would be obviously unfair to make foreign ships pay the expense of the American ships, and as I understand it, no such purpose is contemplated. To compel foreign ships to pay all the expense of the canal would be tantamount to asking them to pay the tolls of the American ships. If, on the other hand, we do not propose to collect sufficient tolls to pay the expense of the canal, then the difference must be provided for by appropriations from the public Treasury. In that case, every dollar given to American ships by the remission of tolls is made up by taxation of the people. That certainly looks like a bounty. You may call it subsidy, you may call it subvention. The fact remains that out of the taxes collected from the people is supplied the means of giving a valuable special privilege to a comparatively small interest.

These questions were important and controlling when the proposition was originally considered. They are interesting now, and I assume that gentlemen will occupy many hours in their discussion. But I sweep them all aside. In my view they are to-day wholly irrelevant and absolutely immaterial. Gentlemen who search for excuses to leave this exemption upon the statute books may discuss them with much learning and at great length, as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has done, but they can hardly persuade themselves that they discuss the real question which now confronts us. The situation is materially different from what it was when the law was passed, for now comes the President of the United States and upon the solemn responsibility of his high office declares, in effect, that the solution of problems which involve the continued friendly relations between our country and the other great nations depends upon the repeal of this law. As patriotic men we ought not to differ as to our duty now. [Applause.] Under our system of government the foreign relations are peculiarly within the province of the Executive. He is the treaty-making power, acting by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The negotiations which lead to agreements, conventions, and treaties between the nations are necessarily within his sole control and guided entirely by his knowledge of conditions, conditions which shift constantly like the colors of the kaleidoscope. In the very nature of things the President must have knowledge of those conditions and their relations to each other which can not at all times be shared with the public or with the legislative branch of the Government. The value of his information would be utterly ruined by its general diffusion. His power to treat in the interest and for the benefit of his country would be shattered beyond hope of usefulness if the world were kept constantly advised of every development and informed of every fact and condition relative to the negotiations. To the President alone is committed the duty of acting upon the knowledge which he alone must have, and upon him is the responsibility for action.

The question, therefore, is shifted from those interesting legal and economical problems which engrossed our attention two years ago, to the practical and patriotic proposition with which we are now confronted. Refined distinctions upon the technical meaning of words and phrases in treaties must await our answer to the question which no man can fail to understand. The interests of shippers and consumers, whether in big profits or small benefits, must give way to the interests of the Nation as a whole while we pause to make reply to this question: Shall the American Congress sustain the President in his conduct of our foreign affairs or shall we rebuke him while all the world looks on? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The country has never failed heretofore to sustain every President who spoke for the country to the other nations of the world, whether his utterance meant peace or called for war. In my judgment the Congress and the country never will fail to stand behind the President in the management of our relations with the other nations of the earth. And it is because they realize this full well that gentlemen adroitly sidestep the real isssue and spend their time, their talents, and their energies in discussing matters which now belong to the realm of ancient history. I venture the confident assertion that if the House could be made to believe that the continuance of our friendly, perhaps our peaceful, relations with the great powers of the world depended upon the acknowledgment of this legislative error, an acknowledgment fraught with no sacrifice of national honor, regardless of the original merits of the controversy, not a single vote would be cast against the repeal. I will go further and declare with equal confidence that if every fact and condition upon which the President has acted in his extraordinary course in making this appeal for a change in a law not yet enforced, could be laid before the Congress the patriotic impulse of every Member would be immediately stirred in the President's support. We would ungrudgingly hold up his hands at the door of every chancellery in Europe. What, then, does the opposition really mean? It means that gentlemen either do not believe the President when he declares "I come to state to you a fact and a situation," or they believe he is mistaken as to the true import of that situation when he asks this repeal "in support of the foreign policy of the administration" and admits without it his inability to deal with other matters of "even greater delicacy and nearer consequence." In other words, gentlemen impeach either the veracity or the intelligence of the President. They would not state it so baldly, but that is exactly what their opposition amounts to. At the bar of public opinion in this country neither impeachment will ever be sustained. [Applause.]

The outcome of our policy with respect to a single foreign government is not necessarily involved. We are not forced to conclude from the President's declaration that the tolls exemption prevents the accomplishment of any particular purpose which this Government has in mind covering its relations with this, that, or the other nation. We may conclude, however, that we can not go forward in any direction with hope of receiving that consideration to which we are entitled so long as we are considered "outlaw" by the nations of the world. Upon every path upon which we start we are opposed by the hurdle of suspicion which comes from the unanimous opinion of the nations of the world that we have either knowingly misinterpreted or willfully violated what is elsewhere considered the plain language of a solemn treaty.

The President has been freely charged with inconsistency because in his campaign he employed words which seemed to indicate that he was favorable to the exemption and referred to its apparent advantages to shipper and consumer. No man who knows the present occupant of the White House will believe that his change of opinion was made lightly or without careful consideration, full investigation, and thorough knowledge of all the facts and circumstances necessary to decision. No stronger proof of the grave import of the situation to which he refers could possibly be offered than this difference in judgment of the candidate and the President. The one was expressed with knowledge shared by every citizen of the United States; the other was based upon information which the Chief Executive alone can have. If this knowledge was sufficient to impel him to an admittedly difficult confession of error, shall we refuse to make like acknowledgment while necessarily in the dark as to all the facts and circumstances essential to a decision? Shall we insist that lack of information must prevail over full knowledge?

Nations like men must obey the law if they would not forfeit the respect of their fellows. I pass over that narrow phase of the international law which nations must obey, comprised within the particular treaty involved in this case, for it is only begging the question to declare that we must acknowledge the obligation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Such a position leaves open to debate the proper interpretation of the language of that treaty. The same obligation of obedience which a law-abiding nation owes to the law of nations, as fixed in solemn contract between two of them, is due also to the interpretation of that contract settled by the unanimous judgment and decree of the nations of the world. For as a great writer on international law has said, a great body of that law—

> Is founded on the tacit or implied consent of nations as deduced from their intercourse with each other; in order to determine whether any particular act is sanctioned or forbidden by this law, we must inquire whether it has been approved or disapproved by civilized nations generally, or at least by the particular nations which are affected in any way by the act. (Halleck's International Law, Vol. I, p. 55.)

In the language of another authority (Hall on International Law, 12):

> If the legal value of national acts is not to be estimated with reference to a divine or natural law, and if treaties are mere evidences of national will, not necessarily more important and occasionally, from being the result of a temporary exigency, less important than some unilateral acts, it remains to be asked whether all indications of national opinion with reference to international law are to be considered of an equal weight, except in so far as their significance is determined by attendant circumstances, and whether, therefore, authority will attach to them in proportion to their number and to the length of time during which they have been repeated. Subject to two important qualifications this may be said to be the case. The first qualification is that unanimous opinion of recent growth is a better foundation of law than long practice on the part of some only of the body of civilized States.

The law of nations will interpret a treaty as effectively for all purposes as it will protect a treaty which needs no interpretation. The Executive, in constant and close touch with the nations of the world, has declared that—

> Whatever may be our own differences of opinion concerning this much-debated measure, its meaning is not debated outside the United States. Everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption.

This unanimous judgment of the nations with respect to the meaning of the language of the treaty constitutes a decree which we can not disobey without taking the law into our own hands. If every great power is of opinion that we have violated our treaty obligations, may we with honor claim that the judgment of a contracting party shall prevail against that of all the rest? We can not do so without violating the desire, which has been shared on both sides of the Atlantic since the foundation of this Republic, to preserve the integrity, to uphold the dignity, and to vindicate the majesty of international law, "A law whose existence and application," in the words of Daniel Webster, "is as advantageous to States as the existence of private law to the citizens of a country." Or to quote from another great American—Chancelor Kent:

> The faithful observance of which is essential to national character and to the happiness of mankind; a necessity not the less urgent because it is based upon the principle that different nations ought to do each other as much good in peace and as little harm in war as possible without injury to their other interests.

Neither party platforms nor trade considerations, relied on so strongly by the gentleman from Alabama, should swerve us from the path where "all the honor lies." I am as great a stickler as any man for the faithful observance of every promise in the party's platform. But changing conditions may sometimes make other considerations more important. The continued peace between this Republic and our neighbors, for instance, is of more vital concern to our people than the preservation of a plank in the Baltimore platform. Besides, the circumstances of the adoption of that plank were such as to weaken its force, to put it mildly. The Democratic members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House of Representatives had reported against the exemption. On the floor it went into the bill by the vote of a minority of the Democrats cooperating with a large body of Republicans. If there was to be a party policy on the question, it was thus determined by a majority of the people's Representatives against the exemption. In the Baltimore convention, however, the subcommittee of the resolutions committee wrote approval of the exemption into the platform as a sort of indorsement of the legislative record of one of its members.

Without debate, necessarily without much consideration, between sunset and sunrise of the last night of a nerve-racking and body-wearing convention, this comparatively minor feature of the platform was adopted. On all the great issues, of course, the platform is binding. On questions of party principle, it must prevail, for it is a solemn covenant with the people. But upon the nonpolitical matters of policy, the judgment of the party's representatives in Congress may be considered of equal weight, certainly so far as the action of the Congress itself is concerned.

I have found no member of the committee on resolutions of that convention who can recall having heard any discussion in the committee room or elsewhere of the very important fact that a majority of Democrats of the House voted against the measure when it passed. The committee was led to believe—so prominent members have told me—that they were indorsing what the Congress had done, assuming that the Democratic majority had shown its support as it must accept the responsibility for everything which had passed the House. I think that Democrats, properly anxious that platform obligations should be faithfully kept, may well agree with the words of Mr. Bryan, who was a member of the committee which framed that platform and whose advocacy of the strict performance of every platform pledge has never wavered, when he says in a letter to me:

> There is an important distinction between a platform pledge on a domestic question, which is under the control of the country, and a platform pledge on a foreign question where our country must act jointly with others. In this case, no matter what the individual opinion of Democrats may be; no matter how desirable they may think free tolls to be, they are not at liberty to do just as they please, because they must consider (first) our treaty obligations and (second) the international effect of free tolls.

Shall trade advantages, as urged by the gentleman from Alabama, lead us to refuse to follow the President? Surely we are not ready to embark upon a policy of laying up wealth by violation of law. Trade is not greater than honor nor profit than fair dealing. [Applause.] Who would have us build up our merchant marine, like a gypsy horse trader, by acknowledging no code of honor nor rule of law under which men and nations must live. Commerce and trade are much to be desired on the part of a nation. The balance in our favor looks comfortable in the books. But the pirate's swag in the long run brings him no joy. As for me, I would not agree that all the trade of all the nations on the earth nor all the wealth of this Nation piled on that of every other could compensate, in the great scheme of the world's advance toward its divinely arranged destiny, for the lives of the countless of God's creatures who would be sacrificed if our friendly relations with the nations should be changed into armed conflict. Wars for trade are as repellent to our present-day civilization as wars for conquest. The greed for commerce, like the desire for conquest, is no argument to sustain a position which might result in serious international complications. War for honor may be justified, but peace with honor is what we crave. [Applause.]

If it be true that "peace hath her victories no less renowned than war"; if it be true that the President leads the treaty-making power as he commands the armed forces of the Nation, let us pause in the day's occupation of supplying armament for his possible use in time of war at untold cost to the American people and furnish to him as a leader in the world movement for peace and good will this armor of a nation's untarnished honor and unbroken faith. [Applause.] Then will this great Nation go forward, unshackled by suspicion, unhampered by distrust; able to command, because it has earned the confidence, the respect, the good will of all the world; able to win, because it will deserve the manifold victories of peace everlasting. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, how much time did the gentleman from Pennsylvania use?

The SPEAKER. Forty-five minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. FERGUSSON].

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Speaker, I come in the capacity of one who voted for free tolls formerly in this House and in the capacity of a man who has changed his mind. I propose to give briefly here the reasons that have animated me in making this change. I do not attach the stigma that seems to have been implied in some speeches against a man who changes his mind. I have had some notable instances or experiences in my own life. Amid the horrors of the Civil War as a small boy I looked at Lincoln as really as bad as if he had horns and hoofs. I have lived long enough to improve by experience and feel now, though I am the son of a slave owner and of a Confederate soldier, to look at Lincoln as one of the greatest men who ever lived. [Applause.]

When this question was before Congress the first time, I voted to exempt American coastwise ships from the payment of tolls for passing through the Panama Canal.

The argument then made, that we were bound by our treaty obligations to make our own ships pay, did not convince me, especially as equally eminent and equally patriotic lawyers squarely differed as to the meaning of the treaty provision on that point. I solved the doubt existing in my own mind by refusing to believe that the eminent Americans who made that treaty intended to give England a veto on anything our country might wish to do in the management of our domestic affairs. The intent when ascertainable controls the construction of all contracts.

The insistence by the advocates of free tolls that to free our ships from that burden would tend to lower railroad rates seemed plausible to me, but further consideration has convinced me that that argument is fallacious, as based on a wrong premise. Instead of helping the weaker competitor in its rivalry with the great Railroad Trust in the matter of transcontinental rates, I am convinced that free tolls will but be a free gift, or subsidy, to a great transportation trust, embracing both the coastwise shipping and the transcontinental railroads. Under our form of government an indirect subsidy is just as vicious in principle as a direct subsidy, though not as repulsive in form. To tax money out of one citizen's pocket and give it to another citizen, as a free gift, shocks the moral sense; it is just as wrong to benefit one by freeing him from paying an impost that all the others are required to pay. It is as certainly a pecuniary benefit as if directly paid.

Moreover, this law repealing free tolls is itself not to be like a law of the Medes and Persians—forever irrepealable. A new treaty can be made. We are voting to-day for to-day, in the light of international circumstances as revealed to us at this moment by the rapidly revolving kaleidoscope of world affairs. We know, on the highest authority, that the civilized world regards us as honor bound by the words of the treaty to make the tolls uniform to all nations, including our own country. To preserve our national honor unsullied, and to be so solicitous to do so as to yield on a point of mere construction of a written instrument—is this not worth while in these admittedly perilous times in the international world? Force this acknowledgment from all the nations, and then, whatever situation impending changes may bring—whether from Mexico or Japan or the British Empire, or from all combined—with a high sense of honor conceded by all, with the strength that comes from conscious rectitude of purpose, with limitless resources and one hundred millions of people descended from such indomitable men as the late Civil War exhibited to the world, we can enter any arena prepared for coming events with perfect confidence as to results.

With Mexico at our very doors in the throes of actual civil war, the deep-seated cause of it being the agrarian trouble—the landless and homeless poor against the landowning rich—the same condition that the eloquent Gracchi described in republican Rome and that enabled Cæsar to overthrow the republic and establish the empire of Rome, itself but the precursor of the Dark Ages; with Great Britain herself and her traditional policy of "dollar diplomacy," and hundreds of millions of dollars of English money now in jeopardy in Mexico; in this critical juncture the President comes to us in formal assembly, not dictatorially, as our opponents so falsely and in such a petty spirit of cheap politics, allege, but truly in a spirit of "common counsel," recognizing our power to give or withhold, and urges us to grant him this law of uniform tolls, in order that he may the better know how to take the next step in his labor of patriotic service to our country. Do not minimize the danger of war at this juncture; do not let the fancied need to weaken the President politically and get some political advantage in the minds of the unthinking or those willing to make money in the demoralization of war times, cause anyone to forget the portentous possibilities of the international complications of this day and hour.

I shall vote to support the President, because I believe he aims at peace as supremely to be desired—he occupies the highest and most advantageous viewpoint of international affairs—because I believe in his wisdom, his patriotism, his moral courage in these times of partisan rancor and false innuendo, and in his constancy and fortitude, as Lincoln displayed them, should the atrocities of actual war ensue. Is there one in this Hall, however he may talk for partisan effect, who does not in his heart hope that the President may be able to avert war?

I do not fear the taunt that the Progressives and the Republicans make that the President has changed and that some of us are going to change. Change is the order of the universe.

The great principle of evolution is based on the fundamental truth that everything is changing all the time. I voted one way before, as the right seemed to me then. I have studied these questions deeply since, and I am moved by an additional admiration for the President, who disdained to give reasons for his change but recognized the circumstances surrounding our country at this moment as the supreme consideration which alone he should consider in his forward step in the effort to maintain peace. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from California [Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND] desires to use some time.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT].

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, when I was a boy they used to tell me of a bird which had the habit of appropriating for its own selfish purposes the nests and structures built by the other birds. I believe they called this bird the cuckoo. However, I never heard it hinted or suggested by anyone that this bird, or any bird or beast for that matter, could successfully perpetrate this somewhat shady trick upon the habitat of the bird which in former administrations was our national emblem, the American eagle. [Applause on the Republican side.] Perhaps it is possible now that Secretary Bryan's "dove of peace" has become our national symbol. Something akin to the possibility of this imposition must have been in the President's mind when he supplicated us to let the British lion "cuckoo" the Panama Canal.

Mr. Speaker, for my part I am unwilling to tolerate, other than specifically provided for in the treaty, another inch of foreign encroachment on the canal even though the cuckoo call urges it in dulcet tones or carols from the White House aviary. [Applause on the Republican side.]

CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY A PARTNERSHIP.

Under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, executed in 1850, England and the United States were, in a sense, equal partners relative to a proposed canal at Nicaragua, both sharing the same expenses of the obligations imposed upon them by that treaty, and, likewise, both were placed upon the same footing with respect to the use and joint and equal protection of the canal. Each nation, in return for the equality of treatment accorded it by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, agreed to protect, at its own expense, the persons employed in making the canal, and their property, from unjust detention, confiscation, seizure, or violence whatsoever; to use their influence with the States through which the canal might be constructed to facilitate construction; to use their good offices to secure a free port at each end of the canal; to protect it, after completion, from interruption, seizure, or unjust confiscation; to guarantee the neutrality thereof; to keep it open and free, so that the capital invested therein might be secure; to invite other nations to agree to similar stipulations; to enter into stipulations with Central American States to promote the construction of the canal; to use their good offices to settle differences as to the right to title of property along the route of the canal; to give encouragement to persons with necessary capital to build the canal.

These were some of the obligations imposed upon England and the United States. In the consideration of the fulfillment of these obligations each nation was to be placed on an equal footing as to charges, etc., in its use of the canal.

DISSOLUTION OF PARTNERSHIP.

When it was desired to terminate this partnership contract, evidenced by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which imposed equal burdens and responsibilities upon the United States and England, a contract for the dissolution of this partnership was executed in the form of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. This latter treaty absolutely relieved England of all the expenses, of all the burdens and responsibilities of caring for and protecting the canal. It transferred these burdens, expenses, and responsibilities onto the United States. It contemplated, in the language of Secretary Hay:

> The whole theory of the treaty is that it (the canal) is to be exclusively the property of the United States and is to be managed, controlled, and defended by it.

Yet in the face of all this, England has the temerity, the audacity, to insist that by virtue of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty she has retained, has arrogated to herself, all the profits and privileges accorded to her under the old partnership agreement as evidenced in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, these privileges and benefits to be hers without the hazard of a dollar, divested of all her former duties and responsibilities.

It seems to me that the bare statement of her position demonstrates its unreasonableness, its untenableness. If it does not, it shows such an unconscionable bargain as to be proof positive of our mental imbecility. The burden of proof should surely rest on one contending for such a position.

We have constructed the canal; we have, as it were, created the property; and by all the rules of law, municipal and international, are entitled to the benefits and the rewards which belong to the creator of the property. If anyone claims a right, a servitude, or an easement in property created or owned by an individual or a nation, the rules of municipal and international law, as well as reason itself, require that he should bear the burden of proof in support of such a claim. In spite of this necessary rule of law and sound reason, the President informs us that so long as the question is debatable he is unwilling to debate it. It is difficult for me to attribute this position solely to punctiliousness in treaty obligations and not to a certain degree of pusillanimity. As long as the question is admittedly a debatable one I shall withhold whatever doubt is implied by that statement in favor of my Nation's unrestricted sovereignty.

THE CONTROVERSY.

What is the real controversy, the real point at issue, between England and the United States? It is England's contention that her commerce is entitled to the same treatment, the same conditions and charges of traffic which we may see fit to accord our commerce, both coastwise and foreign. She contends that section 11 of the Panama Canal act, which enacts that a railway company, subject to the interstate-commerce act of 1887, which prohibits competing railroads from having any interest in vessels operated through the canal, and also that part of the canal act which provides that a vessel engaged in the coastwise or foreign trade of the United States shall not use the canal if its owner is guilty of violating the Sherman Anti-trust Act, are violations of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in case British ships are affected.

It is her contention that free tolls for our coastwise commerce and the railroad provisions are in violation of section 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I shall read section 1 of article 3 of that treaty:

> The canal shall be free and open to vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

It is my intention to briefly examine this claim and ascertain whether or not it is tenable. In 1850 the United States and Great Britain, as I said before, entered into the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. This treaty was superseded and abrogated by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Yet in spite of this abrogation England contends that she is entitled to all the benefits of traffic contemplated in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. We contend that she is not.

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM NOT MOLASSES.

The Democratic platform formulated at Baltimore, when President Wilson was nominated, contained this provision:

We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal. We also favor legislation forbidding the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned or controlled by railway carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal.

Concerning this plank President Wilson, on August 15, 1912, during the campaign, at Washington Park, N. J., said:

Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means business. It means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest and honest men who intend to do business along those lines and who are not waiting to see whether they can catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not.

We have already seen since the inauguration of the President that the platform to which he referred in his Washington Park address contained three pretty large molasses-covered sticks. There was one molasses-coated stick in that part of the platform devoted to the welfare of legitimate industry. There was another thickly smeared stick of molasses in that section relative to the civil service, and still another molasses-coated plank in that section calling for publicity of indorsements for the Federal judiciary. It now remains to be seen how much molasses there was in the Panama Canal plank at the time of the President's address. It remains to be seen whether or not the honeyed words of the President's repeal speech are more enticing bait than the molasses in that plank, admitted to be molasses by the present action of the titular head of the Democratic Party.

The proponents of the English contention, in order to support the same, keep recurring to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. I contend that this is unfair; that whatever of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty it was intended to preserve is embodied in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and should be sought in the four corners of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and not in the abrogated treaty. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty by the express agreement of the parties is now dead and obsolete, and should not be resorted to for the purpose of affirmative proof or affirmative interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. But I believe it fair to resort to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty for a negative interpretation of what is not embodied in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I believe that the absence in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of the clear and explicit terms which are found in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty indicates an intention to forego the provisions contained in those clear and explicit terms of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN THE TWO TREATIES.

In this connection I assert that there is one feature of the phraseology of article 1 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty which, on account of its absence in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, seems significant to me. In the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, article 1, we find it declared in clear and precise language, admitting of no ambiguity or equivocation, that neither the United States nor Great Britain shall obtain—directly or indirectly for the citizens or subjects of the one any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms to the citizens and subjects of the other.

We find the same clear and explicit language in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty:

Being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms.

There is no mistaking the meaning of this language. The terms accorded to the United States are linked with the terms accorded to Great Britain. No advantage shall be gained by the citizens of the one nation over the citizens of the other. Both shall be on equal terms as to the use of the canal. The treaty containing this clear, exact, and precise language was superseded by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It is not to be supposed that the astute and sagacious British diplomat would fail to employ in the superseding treaty or agreement the same plain and precise language, devoid of all ambiguity, unless he intended to surrender the right to receive the same terms, the same advantages, as the citizens of the United States. Yet it is now his contention that this exact language of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty should be read into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. This language and its obvious meaning was before him when the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was being negotiated and when signed. Unless there was an intent to lull us into a false feeling of security, England, which now contends that the equality of treatment contemplated in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty should be read into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, would have resorted to the same precise and unambiguous language and would have linked and coupled her equality of terms with the equality of terms of the United States. Instead of resorting to this language, we find Lord Pauncefote, on October 23, 1901, in his official communication to our Government, writing:

Mr. Hay has suggested that in article 3, rule 1, we should substitute for the words "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations which shall agree to observe these rules," etc., the words "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules," and in the same clause, as a consequential amendment, to substitute for the words "any nation so agreeing" the words "any such nation." His Majesty's Government were prepared to accept this amendment, which seemed to us equally efficacious for the purpose which we had in view, namely, that of insuring that Great Britain should not be placed in a less advantageous position than other powers, while they stopped short of conferring upon other nations the contractual right to the use of the canal.

Secretary Hay in this connection had objected "to inviting other powers to become contract parties to a treaty affecting the canal." It does not admit of reasonable doubt that Secretary Hay was referring to "other powers" than the United States, and likewise Lord Pauncefote in using the same identical words "other powers" employed them in the same sense as Secretary Hay employed them, namely, "other powers" as contradistinguished from the United States. Lord Pauncefote's interpretation, made contemporaneously with the drafting of the treaty, is our position, our interpretation to-day, namely, that the other powers apart from the United States should be on the same footing one with the other. And thus was met in the very language of Lord Pauncefote "the purpose we had in view," namely, that of insuring that Great Britain should not be placed in a less advantageous position than other powers, to wit, the other powers referred to by Secretary Hay, whom he did not wish to become contract parties to the canal.

In this connection I wish to state that Secretary Hay in his memorandum wrote:

The whole theory of the treaty is that it—the canal—is to be exclusively the property of the United States, and is to be managed, controlled, and defended by it.

THE ROSETTA STONE OF THE TREATY.

The insight which Lord Pauncefote's use of Secretary Hay's expression "other powers" affords, as to the intention of the treaty, is further increased by the last clause of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty. This last clause requires:

Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

The clause which I have just read is the Rosetta stone by which we can translate the seemingly occult language of section 1, article 3.

I desire to call particularly to your attention the express significance of this sentence and the reason for its insertion at the end of section 1, article 3. Section 1, article 3, bereft of this last sentence is—

The canal shall be free and open to vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

If by the general terms of the first paragraph of this section 1 the United States was to be included, what was the necessity of adding this last sentence, "Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable"? Was it necessary to exact an agreement from the United States that it would treat the commerce of its own citizens justly and equitably? According to the English contention the first paragraph in section 1 provided for the treatment of all nations, including the United States, on terms of entire equality "in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise," without discrimination against any nation, its citizens or subjects. If the United States was to be placed in the same category with other nations as to the charges and conditions of traffic, as the English interpretation requires under the first part of section 1, in the very nature of things the United States for its own welfare would not impose on its shipping exorbitant charges or harsh conditions. If the United States is to subject its own commerce to the same terms and conditions which it imposes on the other nations, this alone is an earnest, a guaranty, of just and equitable charges. The United States would not impose on other nations burdensome, unjust, or inequitable conditions or charges, for in doing so she would automatically impose them on her own commerce if the English contention is true. The old saying of "What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander" would suggest just and equitable conditions to each of us. There is no necessity for exacting an agreement from the United States, to use an humble expression, "that it would not cut off its nose to spite its face," nor could there be any purpose in inserting this last sentence in section 1, article 3, if the balance of the section provided against high charges by the United States, and it surely does if the English contention is correct. To my mind, the insertion of this last sentence in section 1 shows that England did not consider that she was entitled to the same terms and conditions as the United States, and for this reason it was insisted that the conditions and charges of traffic imposed by the United States on England and other nations should be just and equitable. Bear in mind that article 2 gives the United States "the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal."

If the United States is bound by the provisions of the first part of our section 1, article 3, to collect from its vessels of commerce the same tolls as it imposes on foreign nations, then, obviously, this fact alone would automatically bring about just and equitable conditions and charges of traffic. And consequently, under the English interpretation the last sentence of section 1, article 3, is an idle and surplus rule. It is mere supererogation. It has no place in the treaty except to insure just and equitable charges to nations other than the United States.

SUEZ CANAL TREATY.

I am further confirmed in my views on this point by an examination of the Suez Canal convention of October 29, 1888. There is no provision in this convention that the conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable. And why not? Because all vessels, "without distinction of flag," were to be treated alike. This was sufficient to insure just and equitable charges all around. Each nation could safely rely on the charges being just and equitable when every nation would have to pay the same rate.

The very fact that it was necessary to insert the provision "such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable" in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to regulate the charges fixed by the United States demonstrates that the United States was not to be included in the phrase "all nations" in section 1, article 3. Otherwise this provision is a mere supererogation, for it is a violent presumption to entertain that the United States, in fixing charges which her vessels of commerce would have to pay, would make them unreasonable, and therefore that it was necessary to guard against such action on our part.

INTERPRETATION OF TREATY OF 1815 BY SUPREME COURT.

The real bone of England's contention is that free tolls for our coastwise trade is a violation of section 1, article 3, of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

It has always been the custom of nations to discriminate in favor of their coastwise trade. This may be considered a settled policy of all nations. This discrimination at times has been provided for in treaty, and at other times, although not provided for, has been practiced.

In 1815 the United States and Great Britain entered into a treaty which provided, in article 2:

No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States; nor in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same port on British vessels.

To the lay mind this language would seem broad and comprehensive enough to include all ships, whether coastwise or not. Compare this language with the language in section 1, article 3, of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which England contends precludes us from allowing free tolls to coastwise vessels:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

If anything, certainly the language in the treaty of 1815 is more explicit than the citation which I have read from the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, yet neither England nor the United States ever held that this language in the treaty of 1815 applied to coastwise trade. England has invariably held that she could impose higher charges on foreign vessels than on her coastwise vessels. Such has been the rule in the United States. This rule was upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States in a decision rendered by Mr. Justice White, now Chief Justice, in the case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 332). Permit me to read an excerpt from this decision:

Nor is there merit in the contention that as the vessel in question was a British vessel coming from a foreign port the State laws concerning pilotage are in conflict with a treaty between Great Britain and the United States providing that no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States. Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage resulting from the law of the United States nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by State law concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemption does not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in such trade. In substance the proposition but asserts that because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations, therefore there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even although such regulations apply without discrimination to all vessels in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign. (Olsen v. Smith, 195 U. S., 344.)

President Hayes in his message to Congress of February 10, 1880, in referring to the canal, said:

It would be the great ocean thoroughfare between our Atlantic and our Pacific shores, and virtually a part of the coast line of the United States.

The river and harbor act of 1884, section 4, contains this language:

No tolls or operating charges whatever shall be levied upon or collected from any vessel, dredge, or other water craft passing through any lock, canal, canalized river, or other work for the use and benefit of navigation now belonging to the United States or that may be hereafter acquired or constructed.

MAJORITY REPORT MISLEADING.

A very ingenious—I shall not say disingenuous—argument is resorted to in the majority report of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to destroy the force and application of this opinion. Attention is called in that report to the provisions at the end of article 1 of the treaty of 1815, "but subject always to the laws and statutes of the two countries respectively." This clause is not referred to by the Supreme Court, for it had no bearing on the decision. I shall read the first article of the treaty of 1815 in its entirety:

ARTICLE 1. There shall be between the territories of the United States and all the territories of His Britannic Majesty in Europe a reciprocal liberty of commerce. The inhabitants of the two countries, respectively, shall have liberty freely and securely to come with their ships and cargoes to all such places, ports, and rivers in the territories aforesaid to which other foreigners are permitted to come, to enter into the same, and to remain and reside in any parts of the said territories respectively; also to hire and occupy houses and warehouses for the purposes of their commerce; and generally the merchants and traders of each nation, respectively, shall enjoy the most complete protection and security for their commerce, but subject always to the laws and statutes of the two countries respectively.

It is obvious that the clause "but subject always to the laws and statutes of the two countries, respectively," was not referred to in the decision of the Supreme Court, because it has no relation to the provisions of article 2, which provides—that no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States, nor in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

If the clause at the end of section 1 covers the question of tolls, then by a statutory enactment we are at any time at liberty to ignore article 2. The very reason for article 2 was that the question of tolls should be made definite and certain.

An adroit or unconscious misstatement of the provisions of the last paragraph of the second article of the treaty of 1815 was perhaps made on page 6 of the majority report. The author of this report evidently misinterprets this paragraph when he states:

But in the last paragraph of the second article it is provided that the commerce of the continent of North America and the West Indies "shall not be affected by any provision of this article, but each party shall remain in complete possession of its rights with respect to such intercourse."

The inference which is evidently sought to be given by this statement is that the commerce of North America, and consequently coastwise traffic, was excluded specially by the terms of the treaty, for it is stated in the report:

So in view of the terms of the treaty expressly excluding local commerce of the continent of America and the West Indies from consideration, and also making all the foreign commerce subject to the laws of the country, there is no wonder that the Supreme Court held the statute in question not to be a violation of the treaty.

A most cursory reading of the last paragraph of section 2, referred to, will show the error of this statement:

The intercourse between the United States and His Britannic Majesty's possessions in the West Indies, and on the continent of North America, shall not be affected by any of the provisions of this article, but each party shall remain in the complete possession of its rights with respect to such intercourse.

There is nothing in this quotation or in the treaty itself to justify the bald statement that the commerce of the continent of North America and the West Indies was not affected by the treaty. What was not affected was: First, the intercourse between the United States and the British possessions in the West Indies; and, second, the intercourse between the United States and the British possessions on the continent of North America.

FATUOUS CONTENTION NOT IN BRIEFS.

I therefore assert again that the statement that "the commerce of the Continent of North America and the West Indies" is excluded by the terms of the treaty is a disingenuous statement, if by that statement it is meant that the coastwise trade between the several States of the United States was excluded by the terms of the treaty, and that this fact influenced the Supreme Court. I have examined the briefs filed in the Supreme Court of the United States by both parties to this case, and no contention was therein made that the last provision of article 1 or the last provision of article 2 had any relevancy to the point at issue. The last paragraph of article 1 obviously means that while the inhabitants of the United States or England are in the other country they shall be amenable to the laws of the same. The matter of tolls and charges is treated in a subsequent article—No. 2. If the committee's contention is correct that the tolls and charges are to be subject always to the changing laws and statutes of the two countries according to provision 1, then it was an idle thing to provide in the subsequent article that no higher duties or charges shall be imposed in the one country than in the other on their respective vessels. This treaty relates to commerce between the territories of the United States and the territories of England in Europe. England discriminates in favor of her coastwise trade, yet the same is not specifically excepted by the terms of this treaty. So in spite of the adroit and cunning argument in the majority report I still insist that the Olsen case is in point.

WELLAND CANAL INCIDENT.

Further light is shown on the subject under discussion by a reference to the treaty of Washington between England and the United States, made in 1871. By article 27 of this treaty England engaged "to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion." Likewise we agreed to the use of the St. Clair Flat and other canals by England on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States.

In spite of this explicit agreement for equality of treatment with the inhabitants of Canada, we were discriminated against in the use of the Welland Canal. A rate of 20 cents was fixed on wheat and grain through the Welland Canal, but a rebate of 18 cents was allowed on all wheat bound for Montreal. This made the rate to Montreal 2 cents and the rate to Lake Ontario ports and the upper St. Lawrence ports 20 cents. We claimed that this was a discrimination in violation of the treaty. There being a President of the United States who took no stock in the obsequious, deferential "After you, my dear Alphonse" demeanor now manifested by President Wilson toward Great Britain, a long course of diplomatic representation ensued between the two Governments. After the matter was debated at length, for in that glorious age of our Republic debate with England was not considered dishonorable, England refused to budge from her position. We then resorted to retaliation, and placed a toll of 20 cents a ton on Canadian cargoes passing through the American Sault Ste. Marie Canal. This resulted in the removal of the discrimination which we were suffering at the Welland Canal. Perhaps the futility of the debate over this incident prompted the President to write:

> That as long as the matter is debatable, I do not care to debate it.

In this contention over the Welland Canal England claimed—

> Every obligation of the treaty had been fully and unreservedly met.

And that—

> Holding firmly to their contention that they were justified in adopting the tolls and rebates, they consented to waive their rights in this particular instance and reestablish the system of rebate and transshipment regulations.

The British ambassador further wrote:

> The difference of opinion which exists as to the treaty rights of the two countries is to be regretted, but it forms no ground for a charge that either country in maintaining its own views proceeds with a disregard of solemn obligations.

On comparing this manly statement with the President's abject surrender, I can not help recall the challenge of the defeated and chagrined, but still courageous, Irish troops at the Battle of the Boyne. When deserted by King James, they cried, "Trade leaders and we'll fight it over again."

It is well to note here that the language in the treaty of Washington is explicit and unambiguous and leaves nothing to inference, for the equality accorded to us was to be "on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion."

RESULTS OF ENGLISH INTERPRETATION.

The fallacy and sophistry in a premise may often be exposed by an examination of the conclusion to which they lead. With this in mind, let us examine where the English interpretation of the treaty leads to, if the term "all nations" in section 1, article 3, includes the United States.

If the term "all nations" includes the United States, then the United States is bound by all the provisions of article 3, and we would be compelled to charge our own warships for the use of the canal in times of war and peace. Uncle Sam would be compelled to take money out of one pocket and put it into the other. In case of war we could never exercise any act of hostility within the canal. We could not close the canal to an enemy bent on destroying our Nation. Have we, by a compact, agreed to commit national suicide?

The first treaty, which was rejected by the Senate, contained a provision—

> The canal shall be free and open in time of peace as in time of war to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations.

In the final treaty the expression "in time of peace as in time of war" was omitted. Secretary Hay stated that the omission of this provision "would give to the United States the clear right to close the canal against another belligerent and to protect and defend itself by whatever means might be necessary." Yet, if the English interpretation is true, we could not in war revictual our ships or take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary. The transit of our war vessels through the canal must be with the least possible delay. We could not in war embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal except in the case of accidental hindrance of transit. We could not in war remain in the canal or within 3 marine leagues of either end longer than 24 hours. We could not pursue our enemy's vessel within 24 hours from her departure from the canal. If their contention is true that we are included in the term "all nations" in article 3, the predicament to which I have just called your attention will surround us in the Panama Canal, built at the cost of many lives and $400,000,000 of our money, in a canal concerning which Secretary Hay wrote:

> The whole theory of the treaty is that it is to be exclusively the property of the United States and is to be managed, controlled, and defended by it.

We can not revictual or coal our ships at the canal except when strictly necessary; our passing through in time of war must be with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Imagine the storm of indignation that would have swept the country had the canal been in operation under these terms when the Oregon made her memorable voyage, and had she been met in the canal with rules forbidding her to embark or disembark troops or munitions of war, in a canal over which Lord Grey admits that we have become, practically, sovereigns, or had she been compelled to await 24 hours after the smoke of a Spanish cruiser disappeared below the horizon before pursuit. These are the matters the President refuses to debate with a Nation concerning which President Buchanan said in his message of 1857:

> Since the origin of the Government we have been employed in negotiating treaties with that power and afterwards discussing their true intent and meaning.

Because, as President Wilson says, they are not debated outside of the United States. What matters "of greater delicacy and nearer consequence," to use the President's own language, can there be pending, which he does not know how to deal with, than those involved in the inevitable sequence and corollary of the English interpretation?

PRESIDENT'S NEW JERSEY SPEECH.

The President was not always of the opinion he expressed in his address to us on March 5 last. The solemn pledges of his platform relative to the canal are now turned to the molasses which he so deprecated at Washington Park on August 15, 1912. The compact and treaty between his party and the American people, and also his solemn promise as a candidate to the 2,500 farmers at Washington Park, are now renounced and stultified because our interpretation of the treaty which he and his party adopted as a platform is everywhere, as he says, "questioned and misunderstood." And this is asked for in support of a foreign policy which is likewise everywhere "questioned and misunderstood."

I shall read the President's speech made to the 2,500 farmers at Washington Park, N. J., on August 15, 1912:

> One of the great objects in cutting that great ditch across the Isthmus of Panama is to allow farmers who are near the Atlantic to ship to the Pacific by way of the Atlantic ports, to allow all the farmers on what I may, standing here, call this part of the continent, to find an outlet at ports of the Gulf or the ports of the Atlantic seaboard, and then have coastwise steamers carry their products down around through the canal and up the Pacific coast or down the coast of South America.
> Now, at present there are no ships to do that, and one of the bills pending—passed, I believe, yesterday by the Senate as it had passed the House—provides for free toll for American ships through that canal and prohibits any ship from passing through which is owned by any American railroad company. You see the object of that, don't you? [Applause.] We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage to compete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent.

The farmers of this country are, in my judgment, just as much concerned in the policy of the United States with regard to that canal as any other class of citizens of the United States. Probably they are more concerned than any other one class, and what I am most desirous to see is the farmers of the country coming forward as partners in the great national undertakings and take a wide national, nay, international, view of these great matters, feeling all the pulses of the world that beat in the great arteries of their own life and prosperity. Everything that is done in the interest of cheap transportation is done directly for the farmer as well as for other men. So that you ought not to grudge the millions poured out for the deepening and opening of old and new waterways. * * *

Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means business. It means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest and honest men, who intend to do business along those lines and who are not waiting to see whether they can catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not.

They know the American people are now taking notice in a way in which they never took notice before, and gentlemen who talk one way and vote another are going to be retired to very quiet and private retreat.

Since he will not, it remains for the "unterrified Democracy" of this House to make good the President's Washington Park speech; it remains for you to show that your platform contains not fly-paper molasses, but the genuine old-fashioned article warranted to make Democrats stick to their platform in spite of presidential pull (augmented by a post-office appointment lever on a land-office or customhouse fulcrum).

OREGON QUESTION.

Had President Polk been obsessed with this mingled punctilious and pusillanimous spirit when the Oregon question was to the front in the year 1844, and had he put the molasses muffler in the first instance to the Nation's cry of "Fifty-four forty or fight," the southern boundary of the very State which gave me birth, the State of Oregon, would now be the northern boundary of the United States from the Pacific Ocean to the Rocky Mountains. The patriotic meeting of the Oregon pioneers at Champoeg in the year 1843, and the bold determination of these pioneers not to brook England's claim for the Oregon country, would have come to naught. And the names of Joe Meek and F. X. Matthieu instead of being held as our fearless pioneer patriots on the shores of the Pacific would now be held in execration by an English populace, sovereign to-day in the great States of Oregon, Idaho, Washington, and a part of Montana. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, I am unwilling, in complaisant compliance with the President's wish to declare by implication that the Supreme Court of the United States, in interpreting the treaty of 1815, the Sixty-second Congress, which enacted the Panama Canal act, President Taft and his Secretary of State, also Theodore Roosevelt, who approved it, the Democratic convention at Baltimore, were all violators of our sacred treaty obligations. [Applause on the Republican side.] I will not do this at the President's mere magister dixit.

ANOTHER "LOST OCCASION."

With seemly regard for the feelings of our greatest authority in international law, the President doubtless deferred his toll-repeal speech until John Bassett Moore, Counselor for the Department of State, had quit his office.

In view of the President's speech at Washington Park, his repeal speech might—with proper propriety, on account of the historical coincidence and parallel it would afford of repudiation of party and past—well have been deferred two days later, to March 7, a day sadly conspicuous in our country's history, the anniversary of the "lost occasion" of "sad concessions vainly made" by Webster in his 7th day of March speech, 1850. For on this date also there fell in the estimation of his countryman a great American idol, whose fall evoked Whittier's poem "Ichabod." For his modern prototype we perhaps should have more charity than the pitying words of Whittier:

Revile him not. The Tempter hath
A snare for all;
And pitying tears, not scorn and wrath,
Befit his fall!
* * * * *
All else is gone; from those great eyes
The soul has fled;
When faith is lost, when honor dies,
The man is dead!

We only trust that a modern Whittier, if moved by the melancholy muse, may more kindly palliate President Wilson's "lost occasion," his great mistake, and in paraphrase exclaim, "What private griefs or reasons he has, alas! I know not," for on these he is silent. [Applause on the Republican side.]

THE LARGE QUESTION.

Mr. Speaker, much has been said in this debate concerning the financial bearing of the questions of free tolls on various sections of the country. But, Mr. Speaker, in the presence of the larger patriotic question of our sovereign rights at Panama, in the face of charges and insinuations that my country has been false to its plighted faith, which is the real issue before us, I am unwilling to forego what I consider a patriotic duty. I am unwilling to relinquish what I consider my Nation's rights at Panama or place them in jeopardy, either by pecuniary considerations or by what may seem most expedient to an Executive who confesses, "I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure."

If this is the timid, nerveless, and helpless hand at the helm of our ship of State, let him whose mind is so richly stored with our country's history and literature recall and emulate the courageous Cleveland in his Venezuelan message. If he has no chart for the ship of State in the troublous seas, the Bryany deep into which his foreign policy has plunged us, let him recall the admonitions of Longfellow:

Fear not each sudden sound and shock,
'Tis of the wave and not the rock.
'Tis but the flapping of the sail,
And not a rent made by the gale.
In spite of rocks and tempest's roar,
In spite of false lights on the shore,
Sail on, nor fear to breast the sea,

Nor the canal either, for that matter. [Laughter.]

Our hearts, our hopes, our prayers, our tears,
Our faith triumphant o'er your fears,
Are all with thee, are all with thee.

PRICE OF AN ENGLISH PILOT.

Mr. Speaker, the abdication of our sovereignty at the canal and the cession of the canal territory to all the powers of the world in common is too great a price to pay for taking on an English pilot to help navigate our ship of State in Mexican waters. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, like begets like. You know, alas, too well that while a broken primary pledge may wrest a victory at Baltimore, its foul fruition, a broken platform pledge, will win no victories at the bar of public opinion. [Applause.]

Then your voice was modestly held silent, even though a Presidency was at stake; but now, when the very future, the destiny of your country, may be at stake, at issue, may we not hear that eloquent voice in trumpet tones plead against the deep damnation of this bill, your country's degradation. [Applause.]

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY].

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, on the 5th of March last the President of the United States, addressing Congress, said:

I have come to ask you for the repeal of that provision of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, which exempts vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States from payment of tolls, and to urge upon you the justice, the wisdom, and the large policy of such a repeal with the utmost earnestness of which I am capable. In my own judgment, very fully considered and maturely formed, that exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view, and is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal concluded on November 18, 1901.

The President then made an appeal to Congress to the effect that we should not interpret the words of our own promises with too strained or refined a reading, but that we should do the big thing, the generous thing—and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and for the redemption of every obligation without quibble or hesitation.

As a basis for his appeal to Congress to repeal the provision of law exempting our coastwise vessels from the payment of toll, the President started out with the assumption that such an exemption constitutes a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The President, unfortunately, did not state to the House the reasons which lead him to this conclusion further than to say:

Whatever may be our own differences of opinion concerning this much debated measure, its meaning is not debated outside of the United States. Everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal.

In view of the fact that foreign nations are interested parties and would greatly profit by such an interpretation of the treaty as is suggested by the President, the unanimity of construction about which the President speaks is not surprising, and, taken by itself, could not be safely followed by those charged with protecting American interests.

The country will undoubtedly agree with the President that no strained or technical construction should be placed upon our treaty with Great Britain. A great Government like ours can not afford to juggle with its promises. It must maintain an attitude of good faith and fair dealing at all times and under all circumstances. A treaty is entered into only after careful and mature deliberation, and once made should be lived up to both in letter and in spirit. On the other hand, the mere claim by an interested party that a treaty has been violated, when such is open to serious doubt, should not be timidly conceded. The provision of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty said to be violated by granting free tolls to our coastwise vessels is rule 1 of article 3. The entire article reads as follows:

ARTICLE 3.

The United States adopts as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual or take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay, in accordance with the regulations in force and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of another belligerent.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

In considering the rights of the United States in the Panama Canal it must be remembered that the United States, as builder and owner of the canal, is entitled to dictate the conditions of its use by other countries except as such right may be modified or restricted by the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The canal was built by the United States through territory belonging to the United States and over which we exercise complete sovereignty. It is to be protected, operated, and maintained by the United States. In fact, all the burdens of construction, operation, maintenance, and protection are on the shoulders of the United States.

It is claimed that under rule 1 of article 3 of the treaty cited above that the United States can not grant free tolls to American ships engaged in the coastwise trade. This contention is based on the language of rule 1, which provides that—

the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality and without discrimination in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic.

This construction is based upon the claim that the expression "all nations" includes the United States. The United States made these rules for the neutralization of the canal. In so doing, did we renounce all benefits from the canal except such as all the nations of the world may enjoy in common with us both in peace and in war? An examination of the rules adopted by the United States and incorporated in the treaty with Great Britain, it seems to me, leads irresistibly to the conclusion that these rules were adopted for the customer and not for the owner.

Assuming for the sake of the argument that the expression "all nations" does include the United States, let us examine all the rules of article 3 of the treaty to see what the situation of the United States would be under such a construction. Rule 2 provides that:

The canal shall never be blockaded nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it.

If the term "all nations" includes the United States, and if the canal is never to be blockaded but is to be kept free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations on terms of entire equality with the United States, in that event we will have no more rights in the use of the canal, even in time of war, than the enemy which may be attempting to destroy our Government. Such a construction of the treaty is intolerable.

If, on the other hand, the rule is construed to apply only to foreign nations, it is perfectly proper. If the rule is interpreted to mean that no foreign nation at war with another foreign nation shall be permitted to blockade the canal or commit any act of hostility within it, it becomes a reasonable regulation of the use of the canal and consistent with the idea of ownership of the canal by the United States.

Let us now consider how the proposed construction of the treaty will affect the rights of this Government under rule 3. This rule provides that vessels of war of belligerents shall not take on any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary for immediate use. If the belligerents are two foreign countries, this provision is entirely proper. If, however, one of the belligerents should be the United States, the rule becomes impossible. The canal belongs to us. It was built with American money. It lies wholly within our territory, and yet under this construction, in case of war with a foreign country, our warships could not take on provisions while in the canal except for immediate use. But rule 3 goes on to say further that ships of belligerents must pass through the canal with the least possible delay. This is a perfectly proper regulation if the belligerents be foreign nations, but if the United States be one of the belligerents our warships would be obliged to pass through the canal with all possible speed, just the same as the warships of the enemy. It is unthinkable that we would permit the warships of a country with which we were at war to even enter the Panama Canal. If such a thing were permitted, how easy it would be for the enemy to order its craft sunk in the canal in such a way as to render the canal useless just at a time when we would need it most for the national defense. It is inconceivable that we have made a treaty which would require us to pass the warships of an enemy through a canal owned by us, and wholly within our territory, with the same protection and with the same security as is accorded our own ships. It is inconceivable that ships of war of a hostile foreign country would be permitted to enter the Panama Canal without even a protest from the great guns which we have stationed at either entrance for its protection and defense.

Let us see where such a construction of rule 4 would lead us. It provides that no belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials while in the canal. If this rule is applied only to foreign countries at war with each other it is a highly proper one. If, however, the United States were one of the belligerents, we would not be permitted to embark or disembark troops or supplies while in the canal. The United States would enjoy no more privileges in this regard than the enemy with whom we were at war.

Rule 5 provides that vessels of war of belligerents shall not remain within 3 miles of either end of the canal longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case must depart as soon as possible. When applied to two foreign countries at war with each other this rule is an entirely proper one. But it is impossible to believe that any American statesman ever negotiated a treaty which would require American warships to sail out of our own harbors, away from our own territory, with only a limited supply of provisions, into any danger which might await them. Such a thing is inconceivable. Rule 5 also provides that a vessel of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours of the departure of a vessel of war of another belligerent. I can understand this rule perfectly as applied to foreign nations at war with each other. If this rule is to apply to the United States, in the event of war between us and a foreign country we would not only be obliged to pass the ships of the enemy through our canal, but our warships could not follow in pursuit until the enemy's ship has been given a start of 24 hours. It is inconceivable that a trained diplomat like John Hay ever made any such a bargain as this for the American people. He never could have dreamed of such a construction of the treaty.

Under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty it was contemplated that the canal would be built with private capital through territory owned by neither the United States nor Great Britain. Neither the United States nor Great Britain was to hold the title to the canal or exercise any acts of ownership over it. Our undertaking under that treaty was a joint undertaking with Great Britain to keep the canal open to the ships of commerce and of war of all countries on terms of equality. The canal was to be neutralized and no fortifications were to be erected for its protection. If the canal had been built as thus contemplated, the United States and Great Britain would undoubtedly stand in the same relation to the canal, and in the event of war between the United States and a foreign country the canal would undoubtedly be open to the warships of the enemy as well as our own. But under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we shifted our position from that of a joint protectorate over the canal with Great Britain to that of actual sole owner and builder and proprietor, possessing all the rights of ownership and of construction, and limited only by the promise that we would keep the canal open to all nations observing our rules on terms of equality.

We have said to the world that we would build the canal with our own money and through our own territory; that we will protect it ourselves and keep it open to all nations observing our rules; that we are willing to extend its benefits to all the world; that in doing so we will treat all nations alike; that we will not prefer one nation against another; that we will play no favorites; that as owners and proprietors we will fortify it and defend it against attack. Our agreement with Great Britain is that there shall be no discrimination in dealing with one nation as against another. This, it seems to me, is the proper and reasonable construction to be placed upon our agreement with Great Britain. To accept the construction placed upon this treaty by the President it is necessary to believe that John Hay negotiated a treaty according to the terms of which the United States, the owner of the Panama Canal, is to have no more privileges in the use of that canal than even a foreign nation with whom we might be at war.

That this result would necessarily follow the interpretation now placed upon the treaty by the President is admitted and even defended by Senator McCUMBER in a speech in the Senate July 17, 1912, in which Mr. McCUMBER said:

Mr. President, the hour is late, and I shall not resume any debate on this question. But I want to answer very briefly one of the arguments that was made, not so much by the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] as in a colloquy between the Senator from New York and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], as to whether or not under the treaty stipulations we would have the right to land and revictual our men-of-war, and so forth, in the canal. * * * If my construction of this treaty is right, if the construction is correct which was placed upon it by the Members of the Senate when they adopted it and which was voiced in every argument that was uttered, then there is but one answer: No; that can not be done.

There was one piece of mother earth, the canal and its zone, which should be free from war. It was neither a place where war could be conducted nor a place where munitions of war could be landed, nor a place where the belligerents of either side, whether the United States or any other country, could take any part in the conflict. It was intended to be a zone of peace, which should be acknowledged by all the world as sacred ground.

It will thus be seen that the real question we are deciding here is not the minor question of free tolls to our coastwise ships, but it is the big, far-reaching, and vital question of the rights of this Government in the Panama Canal in time of war. If we accept the interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty advised by the President, there is absolutely no escape from the above conclusions so clearly stated by Mr. McCUMBER.

As a purely economic question, it may well be doubted whether any ships, American or foreign, should pass through the canal without paying toll. Upon that proposition we can well afford to let experience throw some further light. The matter of tolls is purely one of dollars and cents, about which no one needs to become unduly excited. If we find that the exemption of our coastwise ships from payment of toll is not a sound economic policy and is not followed by the benefits claimed, the exemption may be repealed at any time. The question here is not whether we should exempt our coastwise shipping from payment of toll, but whether we have the right under our treaty with Great Britain to make such exemption. Bound up in this bill is the fate of the rights of the American people in the Panama Canal, particularly in the event of war. If we pass this bill, we have not only settled the question of toll, but we have declared to the world that the Panama Canal is to be a neutral channel, to be used even by our declared enemies upon terms of absolute equality with ourselves. If we pass this bill, the nations of the world will forever hold us to the construction placed upon this treaty by the President. If we pass this bill under the circumstances surrounding the demand for its passage and for the reason given by the President, we will tie our hands forever and bind our country for all time to a construction of the treaty which, in my judgment, was never intended by either Government at the time it was made, a construction which will give the United States no more privileges in the use of its own property, located on its own territory, than the enemy with whom we may be at war. I can not vote to place such a construction on the treaty, because I believe that such action on the part of Congress amounts to a plain surrender to Great Britain and may endanger our national safety and deprive the American people of benefits to which they are justly entitled.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. VAUGHAN].

Mr. VAUGHAN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, after the able and eloquent speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER], which so completely expressed my views upon this question and so completely covered them, I feel like apologizing to the House for making any speech upon the subject at all.

Mr. Speaker, on yesterday afternoon the gentleman from Illinois, the leader of the Republican minority, indulged in some sarcastic remarks about those who "prate" about national honor. He gave us to understand that he has his suspicions of anyone who talks about honor. He looks upon it as "prating." Of course, it is awful to rest under the suspicion of the gentleman from Illinois, but, in my humble opinion, the President is right in appealing to our respect for our national honor; and I shall say so even though the gentleman should never get over his suspicions and prate about them the rest of his life. It occurs to me that the gentleman realizes that a due regard for national honor argues powerfully in favor of the repeal, and he would like to prevent it from doing so by discrediting those who speak about it. If the purpose of the gentleman in making his sarcastic remarks was to let us know that he suspicions the President and looks upon his message as "prating," let me say that notwithstanding his suspicions and his prating the name of Woodrow Wilson will shine bright in American history, and he will be honored as the great President under whose leadership Democratic government was restored and the country saved after years of Republican misrule, long after the gentleman from Illinois is forgotten and the fact that he has done more prating in the Sixty-third Congress than any 40 men in it ceases to be a byword.

Under the Constitution the President is intrusted with the making of treaties and the general direction and control of our foreign affairs. He asks us, in support of the policy of his administration as to foreign affairs, to repeal this tolls exemption. Evidently the President has felt that foreign Governments have the impression that "we sail as close to the wind as possible" in interpreting our treaties, and this impression militates against the success of the policy of his administration relating to foreign affairs. I am for the administration, its domestic policy, and its policy as to foreign affairs, and I shall not be deterred from giving it any support, when I think it right, by all this talk of its enemies, outside and inside of our party, about its dictation to us and our taking orders. What has it done to commend it to the people? It has done two things at least, either of which entitles it to a vote of confidence and thanks. It has prevented a panic and it has prevented a war. And if either Mr. Taft or Mr. Roosevelt had been elected we would most certainly have had one or the other, perhaps both.

No administration in the history of the country ever kept faith with the people any better or made a better record for the faithful performance of duty, and if we will as diligently, as faithfully, as wisely do our part as the administration, as the President does his, we will deserve the commendation, "Well done, good and faithful servant," whether we receive it or not; and I have confidence enough in the intelligence and in the fairness of the people to believe we will receive it.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not in the brief time I have discuss the economic question whether it would be advantageous to exempt vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States from the payment of tolls for passage through the Panama Canal, nor the legal question whether the exemption of such vessels from the payment of such tolls is in contravention of our treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal. In my humble opinion these questions become, in the light of the President's message, relatively unimportant compared with the question it presents.

If it be true that the meaning of our treaty with Great Britain is not debated outside of the United States and that everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation and that interpretation precludes the exemption, a much more important question than those heretofore arising over this matter is presented for our consideration. The President tells us that it is a fact that everywhere else the language of the treaty is interpreted as precluding the exemption. If such be the interpretation of all others, justly or unjustly, they look upon us as having refused to comply with obligations we are under by the terms of our treaty.

Now, concede for the purpose of argument that the exemption is not in contravention of the treaty, can we afford to ignore the fact that the judgment of enlightened opinion everywhere else and of many in our own country is to the contrary? No; this matter affects our reputation for good faith and our honor, and there is too much reason to doubt our right to make the exemption, entirely too much room for honest opinion against us, for us to ignore the fact that it is against us. We must convince others that we are right in our interpretation of the treaty or refrain from action in defiance of their interpretation or rest under the imputation of bad faith.

Of course I know we have the right to put our own interpretation upon our treaties and that none other has any right to interpret for us, but others have the right to make their interpretation for themselves, and we have no right to interpret for them. I know we have the right to disregard their interpretation whether ours be right or wrong. But it is also true that if we do disregard the interpretation of others and insist upon our own the world takes cognizance of the controversy and sooner or later enlightened public opinion renders its judgment, and that judgment, if against us, we can not disregard except at the expense of our reputation for good faith. This is exactly the situation which the President has called to our attention. We disagreed with Great Britain about the interpretation of our treaty with her concerning the canal; we put our own interpretation upon it. We disregarded hers. The world has taken cognizance of the controversy, and the great court of public opinion has rendered judgment against us. We can not ignore that court nor disregard its judgment. With no physical force to compel obedience to its decree, the penalty for its disobedience, a reputation for bad faith, is nevertheless as certain to follow as the penalty for the violation of a law of nature. I repeat we must convince others that we are right in our interpretation of the treaty or refrain from action in defiance of their interpretation or rest under the imputation of bad faith.

Is there any fair prospect of reversing the judgment of public opinion abroad on this matter? From what the President says, and I dare say he is in a better position to know than his critics and those who oppose him on this matter, I would judge there is not. So, therefore, if the exemption is not in contravention of the treaty, we are nevertheless confronted with the question whether we should stand for our right to make the exemption at the expense of our reputation for good faith or should protect our honor and good name without raising the question of rights and advantages. Is it so important to us, so necessary to make this exemption in favor of vessels engaged in our coastwise trade, so essential to insist upon this questionable policy, which perhaps at last would only be a subsidy to the owners of the vessels exempted from the tolls—is it so vitally important and necessary to do this, that in order to do so we are willing to rest under the imputation of bad faith? Our honor should be as dear to us as our rights, and our good name and reputation for good faith as sacred. There are times when honor demands the assertion of rights, even fighting for them to the last extremity. But there are times when a due regard for our honor demands that we refrain from their assertion.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. VAUGHAN. But we are told that if we repeal the exemption provision we will be submitting to foreign dictation. No nation has assumed an attitude of dictation toward us about this matter, and there is no probability that any nation will. On the contrary, the probability is that the nations of the world would content themselves with dealing with us as those who have a reputation for bad faith are always dealt with, and let the matter rest at that. But can we complain of dictation simply because others have their opinions about us and deal with us accordingly?

It has been said that we should not permit our determination of what we should do in this matter to be affected by what other nations think about our right to make the exemption; that to do so would be permitting foreign influence to control; that foreign opinion could with as much reason be permitted to influence us to adopt any other policy as be allowed to cause us to repeal this tolls exemption. I answer that there is no one here less susceptible to foreign influence than I am, and while, in my opinion, it may very well be immaterial what others think of us in some respects, I hope the people will never elect anyone to this House or any other office who thinks it immaterial what other nations think of our good faith.

This is an international question about which other nations and the people of other countries have the right to have opinions. Of course, it is for us to say what weight and importance we shall give to their opinions, but we can not ignore the fact that they have the right also in their dealings with us to give such importance as they see proper to their opinions concerning our conduct in this matter. Of course, no nation, nor all the nations of the world combined, should be permitted to control our policy, domestic or foreign, but that "decent respect for the opinions of mankind" which we should have demands that we should determine for ourselves and that we do so in no spirit of resentment, but in a spirit worthy of the great people we represent, that the imputation of bad faith shall not rest upon us.

But we must not truckle to England; at any rate, since we do not believe the exemption provision is in violation of the treaty, we would rather rest under the imputation of bad faith than to truckle to Great Britain. Transcendent statesmanship, so jealous of rights and advantages that it fails to appreciate the value of a reputation for good faith.

Why should we adopt such a course in regard to this matter as to make every other Government and the people of every other country in the Western Hemisphere jealous of us, distrustful and suspicious of us, unfriendly to us? Why should we discriminate in favor of our coastwise trade against the coastwise trade of every other country in either North or South America and thereby give Great Britain the opportunity to make herself the champion of every other country in either America? This is the blunder that American diplomacy made, and it was made under Republican administration, and in dealing with foreign affairs with American, as well as other countries, this administration has been handicapped by it. Let those who talk about surrender to Great Britain remember that they gave Great Britain the opportunity to espouse the cause of other American countries in this matter to the strengthening of her influence in American affairs and to the weakening of our own. If we wish our country to have that influence over American affairs which will enable it not only to maintain the Monroe doctrine but to maintain peace in the Western Hemisphere by the very power of its influence, we must deserve that entire trust and confidence and friendship of every American country that will carry with it that influence. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. VAUGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman already has that privilege.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I was trying to run until 6 o'clock, but if the other gentlemen have no speaker I think we can conclude. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BORCHERS] for the presentation of a request.

ORDER OF BUSINESS—PENSIONS.

Mr. BORCHERS. Mr. Speaker, this being the day set apart for the consideration of pension bills on the Private Calendar, and the same not being disposed of, I ask unanimous consent that they may be considered by the House immediately after the disposition of this matter now pending, except it be on Monday or Wednesday.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, let us see what the situation might be. There have been practically 2½ hours used to-day on this debate.

Mr. MURDOCK. A little more than that.

Mr. MANN. Which would leave 17 or 17½ hours. I take it that the House will not want to proceed on what might be called a heavy debate like this later than the usual time of 5½ or 6 hours a day, perhaps. That might bring the end of the debate late in the afternoon of Tuesday of next week, and it might be desirable and meet the convenience of everybody in the House at that time—I do not know that it will—to transfer Calendar Wednesday until Thursday, because there will be several roll calls on this bill, so that gentlemen would have an opportunity to eat their dinners Tuesday night. I do not desire to interfere with the pension business; but if that should be done you could not make the transfer, and if you could not make the transfer you could not go ahead.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that we have used 3 hours and 25 minutes to-day, so that there is only 16 or 17 hours' time remaining, and if we run 6 hours to-morrow and 6 hours Monday we can get through some time Tuesday afternoon.

Mr. MANN. I think so. There is always some delay, however, in the House. How much time has been used to-day, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Three hours and ten minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. If we run to-morrow and Monday we will get through Tuesday afternoon.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BORCHERS] will modify his request, so that it shall be subject to the transfer referred to, I shall not object to it.

Mr. BORCHERS. I am willing to embody that in my request.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is the request?

Mr. MANN. To give the first day after the disposition of this bill to pension business.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, a conference report on the urgent deficiency bill must be acted upon. Under the order upon which we are acting now it probably can not be taken up until this bill is disposed of. Wednesday is the 1st day of April. On that day a reduction of compensation to certain employees on the Canal Zone goes into effect. The urgent deficiency bill has a provision to prevent that going into effect, and whatever arrangement is made, it will have to be made with the provision to dispose of the conference report on that bill, if it then be before the House.

Mr. MANN. Well, the request can be made subject to the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no objection to that; but that is a matter of such vital importance that it must be considered.

Mr. BORCHERS. Mr. Speaker, I will modify my request so as to make it subject to the consideration of conference reports.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BORCHERS] asks unanimous consent that the next day after this bill is voted on pensions shall be taken up, subject to Calendar Wednesday, or Calendar Wednesday transferred to Thursday, and subject also to the consideration of the conference report on the urgent deficiency bill. Is there objection?

Mr. DIES. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] objects.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 9671. An act to appropriate $5,000 to erect a suitable monument on the battle grounds at the Horse Shoe, on the Tallapoosa River, in the State of Alabama; and

H. R. 9897. An act to amend section 12 of the act entitled "An act to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyright," approved March 4, 1909.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, how a man professing to be a Democrat can vote in favor of free tolls is beyond my understanding. We Democrats have always been aligned against the Republican Party on one distinct issue, and that issue always has been that the Republican Party was in sympathy with and legislated for the interests.

Practically every legislative act of the Republican Party has been based upon this theory. We Democrats have always contended that legislation for the interests, by the interests, and of the interests could not be legislation for the people, by the people, and of the people. They were so inconsistent they could not live side by side.

The argument that our platform proclaims in favor of free tolls is nothing but a guise or cloak to hide another raid upon the public Treasury; and, after all, that is what free tolls means. It is a proposition to compel the taxpayers of this country to pay the tolls that should be legally and legitimately levied upon the ships using it.

The committee of this House on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries reported a week or so ago that of the 235 steamships engaged in the Atlantic and Gulf coast trade 199, representing 94 per cent of the total tonnage, are controlled by a railroad or steamship combine, and of the 106 steamships engaged in the Pacific coast, 68 of the steamers, representing 49 per cent of the total tonnage, were similarly controlled.

It is nonsense to contend that by giving away millions of the taxpayers' money each year in the form of free tolls to these combines they will build up our merchant marine. These combines are greedy associations, formed and conceived in greed. Is any man insane enough to believe that combines will use this money for the public benefit? All they will do is put it into their coffers and sap so much more lifeblood out of the American public.

It is contended that we built a canal connecting the Great Lakes and another connecting the Lakes with the Ohio River, and in view of the fact that these canals are being used by the public free this one, which is built in a foreign section of the world, should be used likewise. Two rights never make a wrong. This fact is no excuse why we should again betray the American taxpayer and vote this money into the treasuries of these combines.

The interests have been in control so many years, not only here in Washington, but in practically every State in the Union, that they have forced the American people to believe that the Government should be run for their benefit, and unless they can dip into the Public Treasury at liberty they feel that they can not run their legitimate enterprises.

The political upheaval we witnessed in the fall of 1912 was brought about because these interests, who had become overpowerful, got jealous and began to fight each other in their efforts to raid the Treasury and rob the people through public grants and benefits, and they overdid it. The inner workings of each have been exposed to the American public, and nothing but a trail of graft, wreckage, and dishonor has been left behind. It is our duty to proclaim not only to the American public but to the world that this Government is to be divorced from the control of the interests; it is to be run for one purpose, and that is to govern the American people. If we proclaim this fact in uncompromising terms, the American public will honor us. When it is once determined that it is useless for the interests and others to come here and seek special benefits and privileges, our business men and public in general will get down to business and conduct it on their own responsibilities. All we should do is to leave business alone, use some common sense, stop harassing everybody and everything, and proclaim this one fact, making our position clear.

It is argued that we improve our rivers and harbors, which are used by the public free of charge, and for this reason we should admit the American shipping through the canal free. We improve our rivers and harbors, not only to aid shipping, but to improve public property and benefit the American people in general. The Panama Canal was constructed as a business proposition and to assist our Navy to more properly protect our eastern and western coasts. This being the case there is no reason why it should not be run on business principles. You never hear of the Standard Oil Co. giving away its products or running any portion of its business for charity. Suppose I were to contend that the Standard Oil Co. should have the free use of the public mails? I would at once be proclaimed as a grafter and an associate of the special interests. I am unable to see a distinction between the two cases. If we can give free passage in the canal to certain ships associated with a combine, we surely can give free use of the mails to the Standard Oil Co. and its subsidiaries.

It is contended that the American public hate England. Let us admit that this is true. Is that a reason why we should vote away the taxpayers' money and give it to these ship and railroad combines? Revenge is sweet, but surely this is no way to revenge ourselves upon England, even though we are seeking to do so. If a thief, when arraigned in court for picking a man's pocket, made a plea in justification that he did it because he did not like his victim's neighbor, we would all laugh at the nerve of the thief.

As a Representative, I can not go to my constituents and say, "The reason I voted to give away your money was because I hate England." I am afraid they would not consider this a valid excuse for letting these combines put their hands in our Public Treasury with freedom.

It is claimed that we built this canal with American money; it is American property, and we can do as we will with it. That is true; but do you appreciate before we turned a spade of dirt and spent one penny upon this canal we consulted England and every country in the world and obtained from them permission to construct it? We purchased the rights of the French people and nation. We then made a solemn written obligation with England, that was taken into consideration by every country in the world, that we would use the canal in a certain way; we would charge equal tolls to every ship that used it, conceding, of course, our right to pass our own warships through the canal free of charge, which is not disputed. Relying upon this written treaty or compact, England and the rest of the world conceded us such rights as they had in that portion of Central America. It may be assumed that they had no rights, but, however, at that time we recognized them, and it is too late now to contend that they had none.

Some say that Theodore Roosevelt, while President, took the territory now occupied by the canal by force, and for this reason all treaty obligations are at an end. No honest man, to say nothing of an honorable nation, would attempt to justify his violation of a plain written obligation on such a dishonorable ground.

These statements about bending a knee to England are nothing more than chaff, which these interests are throwing into the eyes of the American people, with an attempt to blind them, warp their judgment, and direct their attention from the real issue at stake. They are used as a cloak to hide a raid which is being made on the pockets of every taxpayer in this country, more gigantic than has ever been attempted before. We are not bending a knee to England. In preventing the use of this canal by these ship and railroad combines, we are protecting the American property, and at the same time the American taxpayer.

Back in the sixties, when these companies were constructing railroads across the western part of the continent, the same arguments were brought to bear to cover up the raids the railroads at that time were making, not only upon the Public Treasury but upon public property. They covered their tracks so thoroughly that they succeeded in getting over 155,000,000 acres of land that belong to the American people without paying a dollar for it.

These raids on the Public Treasury under the guise of a false patriotism have been made too often. It is time the American people woke up and did some thinking of their own accord.

True patriotism is that which will direct us, as an honorable people, to do the right and honorable thing—keep our flag and good name from being besmirched, and retain our prestige and self-respect. The only way to do this is to live up to our just obligations and not try to plead technicalities. We expect this sort of thing in a justice's court, but we do not expect it of an honorable nation.

Whenever the interests want to rob the public and make a raid, they work upon our race prejudices, religious feelings, or some of our human weaknesses. This is what they are trying to do now. Plain words and a clear, cool head are needed, so we may not only be able to see through their schemes but to legislate for the future in the best possible manner.

Let us think twice and act once; support the President of our common country, and thereby repeal that portion of the canal act that gives away the rights of our people.

Mr. LEWIS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, after listening to the address of President Wilson in which he urged the repeal of the clause in the Panama Canal law providing for the free passage of our coastwise tonnage through the canal as an act of international good faith in the maintenance of our treaty obligations and an injury to our national reputation and trade, I was fairly well satisfied in my mind that it should be the duty of Congress to support the President in his determination to repeal the controverted Panama tolls arrangement. I find, however, upon reading the treaty and after a careful review of the situation, I am convinced that the President is wrong in his contention that to uphold this act exempting coastwise shipping would be committing an act of international dishonor.

After weeks of debate in Congress this act was framed and passed, and the two great political parties of this country—the Progressive and Democratic—embodied in their platforms the declaration favoring the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal. President Wilson, in a speech at Washington Park, N. J., August 15, 1912—and I dare say he knew whereof he spoke, for as a historian and a lawyer he stands preeminent—declared:

The platform of the Democratic Party is not molasses to catch flies. It means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest and honest men, who intend to do business along these lines, and who are not waiting to see whether they can catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not. They know the American people are now taking notice in a way in which they never took notice before, and gentlemen who talk one way and vote another are going to be retired to very quiet and private retreat.

In two short years, when such Democratic statesmen as Senator O'GORMAN and Representative UNDERWOOD still contend that the platform of the Democratic Party should be treated as a covenant between the party and the people, and after an exhaustive study of the question of Panama tolls declare there is no doubt that the American view is the right view, the same old methods are employed by the Democratic Party since its existence. No matter what its platform stands for, it must repudiate. It reminds me of an incident that took place on the outskirts of my home town. On a hot summer day two of our citizens, who had fallen from grace by reason of their intemperate habits, by name Stevie Yeager and George Troxell, for want of something better to do took a stroll into the country in the direction of Dorneyville, at which place a country hotel was conducted by one Davy Gilbert. After walking for some distance in the hot sun, Stevie and George concluded to enjoy a siesta under the shade of a tree growing by the roadside. Awakening from their nap, they both developed an extraordinary desire for a "schnapps," as a drink of whisky is commonly termed up our way, and at once laid plans to "work" Landlord Gilbert. A toad hopping about at Troxell's feet gave him an inspiration. He promptly killed it, and told Yeager he would take it to Landlord Gilbert and present it to him as a bullfrog. He said Gilbert would at once declare it was a toad, and he—Troxell—would bet him the drinks it was a bullfrog, and leave it to the decision of the first man that would come that way. It was arranged between them that Yeager was to arrive upon the scene as the first party after the bet was made. George took the toad to Davy Gilbert, and it turned out as he had expected, by Davy declaring it was a toad, and George promptly bet him the drinks for the party it was a bullfrog, and would leave it to the first party arriving. Yeager promptly arrived, looking very innocent, and upon being asked whether it was a toad or a bullfrog, at once declared it was a bullfrog, thereby making Troxell win the bet. The landlord had his suspicions aroused, but was game, and said: "The drinks are on me all right; but it's a damned old toad, anyhow." No matter how the old Democratic Party disguises itself by false promises and alluring declarations in its platform, it is the same old reactionary, free-trade, special-privilege party as of old.

President Wilson in his preelection speeches always declared that the American people—want water carriage to complete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would cross the continent. We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves.

Why this sudden change in opposition to cheap transportation? Is the Democratic Party like the discredited old Republican Party, about to disregard all of its declarations and nurse the interests of "special privilege"?

It seems to me that the hue and cry made by the Democratic statesmen who follow the administration blindly about our national honor being sullied by the tolls-exemption clause of the Panama Canal act is being made "a play to the gallery." I wonder sometimes if these patriots are prompted by motives as lofty and patriotic as appears. Let us not forget, Mr. Speaker, that great corporations, who can wield a powerful influence for or against a political party, engaged in a transcontinental business, have a good reason, purely on private grounds, to foster this agitation. It is clear that if coastwise shipping is not exempted from tolls, concerns engaged in two fields of transportation can combine in a manner to keep rates up and rob the public of the benefits of cheap water transportation.

The argument that the remitting of tolls in the Panama Canal to American ships would constitute a dangerous ship subsidy is a strained and forced conclusion. Every nation now clamoring to restrict American shipping by imposing tolls on American vessels pays ship subsidies and builds up its own commerce thereby. If we repeal the exemption clause we will make the Pacific coast the dumping ground of European shipowners and manufacturers and give them an annual subsidy of nearly as many millions of dollars as the west coast imports millions of tons to the great loss of our eastern manufacturers and our intercoastal shipping and building interests.

England, it can not be argued, has any interest whatever in our coastwise trade. Like all other foreign nations, she is barred by law from engaging in coastwise steamship traffic of this country.

It does not take a lawyer, a scholar, or a statesman to determine that she can have no possible interest in the question of canal tolls which affect coastwise vessels only. Then, what possible right, Mr. Speaker, has she to raise the question of how we should manage our own private affairs. To me it is very evident that the whole question resolves itself into the fact as to whether or not the Isthmus of Panama is our territory. The canal is an American enterprise, paid for by American money, cut through American soil. Then, since every country from time immemorial has regulated its coastwise trade and when it had the power never allowed any interference therewith, should not the American Republic rule and govern the canal without foreign advice or interference? While we wish to preserve our good relations with the British Government, yet, in self-respect, we must assert our rights and not be guilty of toadyism or allow dictation.

I trust there will be a sufficient number of patriotic Americans in this House who will remain steadfast in the face of unwarranted demands, having no dishonorable motives toward foreign powers, and firm in conserving our sovereign right to enact laws governing our own property in the carrying out of the purposes our Government had in view in constructing and controlling the Panama Canal.

The enactment of the present tariff law was a deliberate and cold-blooded betrayal of the interests of the American farmer, laborer, and manufacturer. It is to-day the best European measure written in the statute books of the nations. Let us not retreat again in favor of foreign interests, for if we do it will be all the harder for us to assert our just rights in the future.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 56 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, March 28, 1914, at 12 o'clock.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination and survey of New York Harbor, N. Y., with a view to securing additional width in Bay Ridge and Red Hook Channels (H. Doc. No. 863); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination and survey of Manteo Bay, N. C., including its approaches, and extending to the upper limits of the town of Manteo (H. Doc. No. 864); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

3. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination and survey of San Juan Harbor, P. R., with a view to improvement in cooperation with the local government (H. Doc. No. 865); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

SENATE.

SATURDAY, March 28, 1914.

Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D., of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

O Thou who makest the morning when man goeth forth to his labor and to his work, we stand in Thy presence, our heavenly Father, to thank Thee for the gift of a new day and for another opportunity to serve Thee in working the will of this Thy people. Give us grace, we humbly beseech Thee, whereby we may this day serve Thee in all reverence and in godly fear. And grant that the words of our mouth and the meditation of our heart may be acceptable in Thy sight, O Lord, our Strength and our Redeemer. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Secretary of War employed Emory R. Johnson special commissioner on the Panama traffic and tolls. He has been connected with the Panama Canal and is considered an expert. I desire to ask that just a few lines from the conclusion of his report may be read. I think it of great interest to the Senate and the country just at this time. The request applies only to about a quarter of a page—his conclusions as the result of his work.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. Reading from document entitled "Panama Canal Traffic and Tolls," page 199——

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I am not going to object to the reading, because Prof. Johnson was heard at length before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals when the bill was up. His report was on file and he was called before us and his testimony has been printed at length. I am not going to object to the reading of the tract.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is just a few lines, giving a summary of his conclusions that I think would be interesting.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to know just what the summary is.

The Secretary read as follows:

5. It is earnestly argued by those who favor relieving American shipping of Panama tolls that the policy should be adopted in order to give further aid to the American merchant marine. When subjected to analysis this argument loses force. Our shipping employed in the foreign trade needs assistance, but our coastwise marine has a monopoly of the coastwise trade and does not need further aid. In 1911 there were 3,537,750 tons of American ships enrolled for the domestic trade on the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific seaboards. The increase during the preceding decade had been 38 per cent. There is thus a relatively large and healthily increasing tonnage of coastwise shipping, and the opening of the Panama Canal will undoubtedly bring about a large addition to the coastwise fleet. Our coastwise marine is now given sufficient aid and protection by our navigation laws.

1. In managing the Panama Canal and in fixing tolls the usefulness of the waterway to commerce and industry should be given first consideration. The policy as regards tolls and revenue should not be allowed to limit the traffic usefulness of the waterway.

2. The Panama Canal should be made commercially self-supporting. Tolls based upon the value of the service rendered by the canal are justifiable. Those who use the waterway may justly be required to make some compensation for the benefits received. Tolls, not unduly restricting the commercial usefulness of the waterway, may be levied that will yield revenue enough to meet operation, maintenance, sanitation, government, annuity, and interest charges.

3. The same rate of toll should be charged upon American as upon foreign vessels, because—

(a) The omission or repayment of tolls on American shipping would be of assistance mainly to our coastwise shipping, which does not need aid and would be of but little help to American vessels engaged in the foreign trade.

(b) Such subsidies as are given the American merchant marine should be paid to vessels employed in our foreign trade; but the remission or repayment to vessel owners of Panama tolls on American ships in the foreign trade would be an ineffective subsidy that might invite retaliatory measures by foreign Governments.

(c) The exemption of coastwise shipping from Panama tolls would inure mainly to the benefit of the coastwise carriers and only partially to the benefit of shippers and consumers. Neither the rates of the steamship lines nor the charges of the rail carriers will be appreciably higher if tolls are charged on coastwise shipping than they will be if such shipping is relieved from the payment of tolls.

4. The United States should adhere to business principles in the management of the Panama Canal. The Government needs to guard its revenues carefully. Present demands on the general budget are heavy and are certain to be larger. Taxes must necessarily increase. Those who directly benefit from using the canal, rather than the general taxpayers, ought to pay the expenses of operating and carrying the Panama Canal commercially.

5. The tolls at Panama should be such as to enable the canal (a) to divert from the Straits of Magellan all the traffic of the Pacific coast of South America, (b) to prevent the use of the Cape of Good Hope route by the commerce between the Atlantic-Gulf coast of the United States and Australia, (c) to divert from the Suez Canal the trade between the eastern seaboard of the United States and the Orient east of Singapore, and (d) to compete with the Suez Canal for a portion of Europe's commerce with the Far East.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I think some verbal explanation should be made as to this summary. You will note in the last part Dr. Johnson contends that the tolls should be fixed so as to divert the traffic from Suez, the Cape of Good Hope, and so forth. In conversation and also before the committee, as I remember, he advocated charging a very much higher rate of tolls on the traffic between the western coast of Central America and New York than that charged countries farther away from the canal. To illustrate his idea, he would charge, we will say, $2 a ton between ports of Central America and New York on the traffic that passes through the canal, while from Valparaiso in Chile he would fix a rate probably as low as 25 cents a ton. He would have the rate from Japan very much lower than the rate from Guatemala. His whole idea is to use the canal as a private corporation, and charge what the traffic will bear. That is his whole idea of traffic and tolls, so far as his testimony went before the committee.

If the Senator from Georgia will examine that entire report as well as his testimony, I think he will find that he would not concur in Dr. Johnson's idea of fixing tolls on the canal.

Mr. O'GORMAN. May I ask the Senator from Kansas a question?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Is this Mr. Johnson the same who, while in the employ of the United States Government, was delivering lectures for the Carnegie Peace Fund?

Mr. BRISTOW. I understand he is the same gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator from Kansas will permit me, he seems to be very familiar with Prof. Johnson's suggestion. As a matter of fact, the report which he made as a basis for the tolls to be exacted under American law did not harmonize with the views of the President or of Congress. Is not that true?

Mr. BRISTOW. No; I think not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Especially as to the coastwise shipping.

Mr. BRISTOW. I think not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, there is so much confusion in the Chamber that we can not hear on this side the discussion that is going on upon the other side.

Mr. BRISTOW. As I understand it, the President accepted his report as to the estimated amount of tonnage that would pass through the canal, domestic and foreign, and took into consideration those statistics when he ultimately fixed the tolls which should be charged on the traffic.

Mr. TOWNSEND. And also took into consideration in fixing tolls the amount of domestic commerce which would pass through the canal; that is, the rate was made on the same basis as though domestic commerce actually paid the same tolls as foreign commerce.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; he doubtless took that into consideration; but the President did not agree with Dr. Johnson's suggestion, so far, the method which he would follow in fixing these tolls, because Dr. Johnson would have the people of Central America——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Penalized.

Mr. BRISTOW. Penalized, because they lived close to this country. He would permit the people of the South Sea islands to use the canal for 25 cents a ton and he would charge the people along the Pacific coast of Central and South America five, six, eight, or ten times that much, because the canal will be of more use to them. He would have compelled them to pay what the traffic would bear, the iniquitous system that has been imposed by a number of railroads in this country that oppress small communities.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I do not desire at this time to enter into any general discussion of Mr. Johnson or of any vagaries he may have upon the question disconnected with the immediate question before the Senate. This report of his contains an enormous amount of most valuable data bearing upon the immediate question of charging tolls against the coastwise vessels. He reaches the conclusion that—

Our shipping employed in the foreign trade needs assistance, but our coastwise marine has a monopoly of the coastwise trade, and does not need further aid.

The facts which he presents, in my opinion, fully justify the latter part of this conclusion. He reaches the further conclusion that—

Our coastwise marine is now given sufficient aid and protection by our navigation laws.

I think the facts he presents fully sustain that conclusion. Furthermore, he reaches the conclusion that—

(c) The exemption of coastwise shipping from Panama tolls would inure mainly to the benefit of the coastwise carriers and only partially to the benefit of shippers and consumers.

I think he fully sustains that conclusion. It is these three conclusions which I present from him, and which I propose myself to present, facts which I think fully sustain later on, when I shall endeavor to discuss this question before the Senate.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, the Senator, of course, further understands that Mr. Johnson believes that the railroad ships should be permitted to use the canal the same as any other ships. I trust the Senator from Georgia will not follow him that far in his conclusions and undertake to repeal other sections of the law that we, in the face of the opposition of Dr. Johnson and a number of disciples of that order, incorporated into the statute.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am only following Dr. Johnson—I believe the Senator called him doctor, or Prof. Johnson; I am not even familiar with his title—I am only following him in the conclusions I have mentioned. I think he furnishes facts in this report fully sustaining those conclusions, those conclusions being that the coastwise vessels now have practically a monopoly, that they need no Government subsidy, and that we ought not to give it to them in the shape of free passage through the canal.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia a question. Does Dr. Johnson anywhere in that report discuss the other question, which is the real question before the Senate now, as to the right of the United States Government to regulate the question of tolls?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all. He discusses it simply from an economic standpoint. If so, I have not found it in his report.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not think he does.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is a very long report, and I have not read everything in it carefully.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, in addition to what the Senator from Kansas has said, of course every Senator in this Chamber had all this information before we passed upon this question two years ago. All the information contained in the report of Prof. Johnson was here when Congress determined that he was not only unwise but impractical in his suggestions.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Not only that, but the data gathered by Prof. Johnson was known before the Baltimore convention occurred, and did not seem to have much influence on that convention or upon the President or the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, is it in order to call for the regular order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The presentation of petitions and memorials is in order.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 13811) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Lansing and Bay City, in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to have read resolutions adopted by the Abilene Chamber of Commerce, and ask that they may be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

ABILENE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
ABILENE, TEX., March 19, 1914.

Noting with interest the articles appearing in the Abilene Daily Reporter relative to the bill introduced in the United States Senate by Senator JOSEPH L. BRISTOW, of Kansas, in which is provided for a study of conditions in western Kansas, eastern New Mexico, Colorado, Nebraska, western Oklahoma, and Texas looking to the establishment of irrigation by the lake and reservoir systems, and feeling the great need of a law thus making it possible for this vast and rich country to be brought under irrigation, the Abilene Chamber of Commerce would hereby express its deep interest in this subject and has caused the following resolution be be passed:

Be it resolved, That we indorse the bill of Senator JOSEPH L. BRISTOW, of Kansas, and that we hereby request our Senators and Congressmen to support the same, if in their judgment they deem it wise.

Be it further resolved, That we hereby request that Texas be included in the list of States to be studied and for which appropriations may be made.

Respectfully submitted.

GEORGE FINBERG, President.
FRED T. WOOD, Secretary.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to say that I am in absolute accord with the suggestion that Texas ought to be included in this investigation, and I understand the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] already has a bill pending to that effect before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. BRISTOW presented petitions of 375 citizens of Stockton, 925 citizens of Lawrence, and 230 citizens of Valley Center, all in the State of Kansas, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CHILTON presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Wheeling, W. Va., praying that an appropriation be made for the beautifying of the city of Washington, D. C., which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. THORNTON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Elton, Welsh, and Crowley, all in the State of Louisiana, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JAMES. I present resolutions adopted in the Senate of the General Assembly of Kentucky, indorsing the provisions of a bill to create the coast guard by combining therein the existing Life-Saving Service and Revenue-Cutter Service, known as Senate bill No. 2337, introduced by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I ask that the resolutions may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IN SENATE OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF KENTUCKY.

Whereas there is located at Louisville, in the State of Kentucky, United States Life-Saving Station No. 10, in command of Capt. John F. Gilhooley and a crew of seven men, who since the establishment of said station in 1881 have rendered great and valued service in their heroic deeds of the past in the saving of lives and floating property, and especially in their prompt rescue of all the passengers and crew of the ill-fated Queen City, numbering 200 souls, when that magnificent vessel, en route to the New Orleans Mardi Gras, sank by being carried against the dam opposite Louisville at 1.30 a. m. February 17, 1914: Be it

Resolved, That the Kentucky Senate in session assembled do take this opportunity of giving deep expression of gratitude for the conspicuous services rendered in the past by these faithful and fearless men of the Life-Saving Service, and especially for their valuable aid rendered the flood sufferers of our State during the disastrous floods of January and March, 1913; and we hereby heartily indorse all the provisions of a bill "To create the coast guard by combining therein the existing Life-Saving Service and Revenue-Cutter Service," known as United States Senate bill No. 2337, introduced by Senator TOWNSEND, of Michigan, and now pending in the United States Senate: Be it further

Resolved, That we heartily urge the enactment of said bill to become a law, believing that said bill is a just measure; and that a copy of this resolution be mailed to every Congressman and United States Senator from Kentucky, whose influence in behalf of the above bill is most respectfully requested.

Tuesday, February 24, 1914.
Adopted.
A copy.
Attest:

WILEY L. DIXON,
Chief Clerk of Senate.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I present a telegram in the nature of a petition which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the telegram was read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

[Telegram.]

Mr. KERN presented petitions of sundry citizens of Fairmont, Frankton, Frankfort, and Mishawaka, all in the State of Indiana, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of Local Union No. 2689, United Mine Workers of America, of Sullivan, Ind., remonstrating against the arrest of "Mother" Jones by the military authorities of Colorado, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. WEEKS presented a memorial of 125 citizens of New Bedford, Mass., remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of the Ancient Order of Hibernians, of Worcester, Mass., and a memorial of the Knights of Robert Emmet, of Worcester, Mass., remonstrating against the repeal of the exemption clause of the Panama Canal act, which were referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. McLEAN presented a memorial of First Division, Ancient Order of Hibernians, of Southington, Conn., remonstrating against an appropriation for the celebration of the so-called "One hundred years of peace among English-speaking peoples," which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of the Socialist Party of New London, Conn., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to provide an educational test for immigrants to this country, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Ancient Order of Hibernians of Naugatuck, Conn., remonstrating against the repeal of the exemption clause of the Panama Canal act, which was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Meriden and Bridgeport, in the State of Connecticut, remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of the Society of Master House Painters and Decorators, of Hartford, Conn., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to make lawful certain agreements between employees and laborers and persons engaged in agriculture and horticulture, and to limit the issuing of injunctions in certain cases, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of the congregations of the Congregational and Methodist Churches, of Bethan; the Methodist Episcopal Church of New London; and of the Methodist Church of Thompsonville, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHIVELY presented petitions of sundry citizens of Wolcott, South Bend, Huntington, Kendallville, Elkhart, and Goodland, all in the State of Indiana, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Marion, New Albany, Logansport, Evansville, and Indianapolis, all in the State of Indiana, remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LODGE presented petitions of 100 citizens of Fall River, 100 citizens of Sterling, and 250 citizens of Attleboro, all in the State of Massachusetts, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1621) authorizing the appointment of Maj. George A. Armes, United States Army, retired, to the rank and grade of brigadier general on the retired list of the Army without increase of pay, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 318, authorizing the Committee on Banking and Currency to employ expert assistance in drafting a bill relating to rural credits, reported it without amendment.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted a report (No. 390), accompanied by a bill (S. 5087) for the relief of Edward L. Keyes.

Mr. CHILTON, from the Committee on the Census, to which was referred the bill (S. 4843) to amend section 4 of the act entitled "An act to provide for a permanent Census Office," approved March 6, 1902, reported it without amendment.

BILLS AND DEBATES ON TRUSTS.

Mr. CHILTON. On the 5th instant the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] submitted a resolution, being Senate resolution 286, authorizing the printing of 500 additional copies of Senate Document No. 147, Fifty-seventh Congress, second session, for the use of the Senate, and it was referred to the Committee on Printing for consideration. Inasmuch as the cost of printing the 500 copies proposed exceeds the sum of $500, the law requires the order to print to be in the form of a concurrent resolution. The Committee on Printing authorizes me to report a concurrent resolution as a substitute for the resolution submitted by the Senator from Arkansas, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be read.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 21) was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 500 additional copies of Senate Document No. 147, Fifty-seventh Congress, second session, entitled "Bills and debates in Congress on trusts," for the use of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Until I can be further informed in regard to the matter, I shall object. I do not see any use of republishing debates which are already to be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Perhaps I may withdraw the objection at some future time, but until I have further light upon the subject I shall object.

Mr. CHILTON. This resolution provides for printing additional copies of a document that has heretofore been printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that, but I understood the Senator from West Virginia to say that it was for the reprinting of debates which had occurred in the two Houses upon the trust question. Those debates are all in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and anybody seeking them can find them there.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being objection, the resolution will go to the calendar.

CICERO L. LINCOLN VERSUS UNITED STATES (S. DOC. NO. 458).

Mr. CHILTON. From the Committee on Printing I report back favorably a paper submitted by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] for the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to print the decision of the Court of Claims in the case of Cicero L. Lincoln, administrator, against United States, in relation to cotton seized during the Civil War and the right of recovery. I am directed by that committee to ask that it be printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE PREFERENTIAL BALLOT.

Mr. CHILTON. I make a favorable report from the Committee on Printing on the document submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] to print the address of Prof. Lewis Jerome Johnson, of Harvard, on "The preferential ballot"; and I report a resolution for which I ask immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 320), as follows:

Resolved, That the papers presented by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] February 11, 1914, being an address by Lewis Jerome Johnson before the First National Conference on Popular Government, held in Washington, D. C., December 6, 1913, upon the subject "The preferential ballot as a possible substitute for the direct primary," be printed as a public document.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, before immediate consideration of the resolution is granted, reserving the right to object, I wish to say that it seems to me at first blush that if all the addresses made throughout the country upon one side or the other of the initiative and referendum and preferential primaries are to be published as Government documents, we shall be overwhelming the Government Printing Office with miscellaneous literature. What is the particular need for this particular document?

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, this address relates to a live question which is before the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives. It is not very long. The committee considered the matter with a great deal of care and decided that it was the kind of discussion of a live question which merited printing.

I wish to say that the committee is trying to sift the wheat from the chaff. We have taken into consideration the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi that everything referred to us should not be printed; but we have considered that this is a document that should be printed. We have therefore reported upon it favorably.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I object to the immediate consideration of the resolution, but do not know what my action will be when the matter comes up on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go to the calendar.

POWER OF THE FEDERAL JUDICIARY.

Mr. CHILTON. From the Committee on Printing I report back favorably Senate resolution 305, to print a pamphlet entitled "The Power of the Federal Judiciary to Declare Legislation Invalid which Conflicts with the Federal Constitution," by David K. Watson, submitted by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] on the 18th instant, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I should like to have that go to the calendar until we can take stock of what we are doing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go to the calendar.

ADDRESSES BEFORE THE SOUTHERN COMMERCIAL CONGRESS.

Mr. CHILTON. On the 12th instant the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] presented addresses delivered at the memorial session of the Southern Commercial Congress in honor of the late Dr. Seaman A. Knapp, who had charge of the farmers' cooperative demonstration work of the Department of Agriculture for many years, and they were referred to the Committee on Printing for action. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report the following resolution, and I ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 321), as follows:

Resolved, That the papers presented in the Senate by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] March 12, 1914, "Proceedings of the Fourth Annual Convention of the Southern Commercial Congress, arranged as a memorial to the late Dr. Seaman A. Knapp," be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed on the calendar.

JEWISH IMMIGRANTS.

Mr. CHILTON. The junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] presented on the 24th instant and had referred to the Committee on Printing a report by the committee of the Jewish Immigration Council on illiteracy among Jewish immigrants and its causes. The committee have authorized me to report the following resolution, and I ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 322), as follows:

Resolved, That an article presented in the Senate by the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] March 24, 1914, entitled "Illiteracy Among Jewish Immigrants and its Causes," be printed as a public document.

PRINTING OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from West Virginia what has become of the document which I presented and had referred to the Committee on Printing in relation to truck soils, which is of great interest to the farmers along the eastern Carolina coast all the way to Florida. It is a very valuable paper, prepared by the Agricultural Department, and I understand it will not cost much to print it. I presented it on February 10 and made a request for its printing, and so far there has been no report on it.

Mr. CHILTON. The committee considered the matter very carefully and decided that it came under the ban of the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] in the matter just disposed of, and that it should not be printed as a public document, and therefore decided not to report it. I favored printing it, but the committee did not.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why should it not be printed as a public document? It affects the farmers of the South and throughout that whole section. It is already in print.

Mr. CHILTON. For that very reason the committee did not think it necessary to print it again. There must be some limit to this custom of reprinting documents printed by departments.

Mr. OVERMAN. But the document is now out of print, so far as the Agricultural Department is concerned, and therefore I desire to have it printed as a public document. It informs the farmers how to raise truck. It seems to me, instead of our publishing addresses which nobody reads, that scientific reports teaching farmers how to raise truck ought to be published as public documents, so that we may send them out to the farmers. The document I refer to is a very valuable one, and I can not understand why we can not get a report from the committee favorable to its printing. I should like to have a report made upon it, whether favorable or unfavorable, so as to bring the question before the Senate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I merely wish to join in what the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] has said. Some time ago I submitted—and it was referred to the same committee—a document of a similar general nature as the one spoken of by the Senator from North Carolina. I suppose the Committee on Printing does not regard it as important, because it is a matter that the Committee on Printing does not know anything about, but it is, nevertheless, a matter of great importance.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will say to the Senator from Washington that when it comes to documents which affect the interests of the farmers all over the country we can not get a report to have them printed, but we can have printed a lot of speeches made by Tom, Dick, and Harry all over the country.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The document to which I refer is one of material concern to those engaged in one of the most important departments of agriculture on the Pacific coast, namely, apple growing.

Mr. GALLINGER. It has been reported.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If it has been reported, I am very glad to know it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, so that there will be no misunderstanding in the Senate in relation to the Committee on Printing failing to report favorably on the request of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] for the printing of the document to which he has referred, I wish to say that the document in question is one that has been printed by the Agricultural Department. Appropriations are made every year to enable the various departments of the Government to print certain information. There has been a tendency of late on the part of a number of the departments, as soon as their appropriations have been exhausted, to have some Senator or Representative ask that documents printed by them be reprinted as public documents, because in that way the printing does not cost the department a cent and the expense is thrown upon the printing fund of the Senate or of the House of Representatives.

Mr. President, if we undertake to print departmental documents as public documents, I warn the Senate that there will never be any end to the practice.

Mr. OVERMAN. Has there ever been a request during this session to publish a document in regard to the farming interests of this country, except the request made by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] and the one made by myself?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; there are a number of such requests pending in the committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have never heard of them. I wish to say to the Senator that the Department of Agriculture has not requested me to have this document printed, but I have received requests from farmers throughout the South asking for copies of this document prepared by the Agricultural Department. I wrote that department, and they advised me that the document was out of print. Therefore I asked that it be printed as a public document because there is a great demand all through the country for it. Why is it that there are published millions of documents which nobody reads, and when a Senator makes a request for the printing of a document containing information which will aid the farmers and promote the farming interests of the country objection is made?

Mr. SMOOT. I am in full sympathy with the position which the Senator takes in relation to printing of speeches of Tom, Dick, and Harry as public documents. If this practice continues we will be printing every speech that is made by anybody in any part of the United States as a public document. I am opposed to printing the ones reported this morning, and shall continue my opposition to printing similar matter.

Mr. OVERMAN. We have this morning ordered printed as a document matter which every man can go to the court or to any law library and read for himself. I do not object to that, but here is a document of interest to the farmers of the country, and it is not even reported upon by the committee. I desire a report either adversely or favorably on my request for the printing of that document.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I feel that I ought to call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is called for. Reports of committees are still in order.

INDIAN RESERVATIONS LANDS.

Mr. GRONNA. From the Committee on Indian Affairs I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 4632) for the relief of settlers on the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, in the State of North Dakota, and the Cheyenne River and Standing Rock Indian Reservations, in the States of South Dakota and North Dakota, and I submit a report (No. 389) thereon. As this is an urgency measure, I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill reported by him.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill be read for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, what is the request?

The VICE PRESIDENT. For the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. REED. What Senator made the request?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA].

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I desire to confer with the Senator from North Dakota for a second.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate take a recess for 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to; and at the expiration of the recess the Senate reassembled.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, as I stated, I do not believe there can possibly be any objection to this bill. It is an urgency measure. It provides for the extension of the payments on lands on certain Indian reservations. The bill has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs. It is indorsed by the Secretary of the Interior. It will not take over two minutes to pass it. Unless this legislation is had, these settlers will lose their lands and the amount of payments previously made. It is for that reason that I am asking that the bill be passed at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill referred to by him. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the reading of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to extend for a period of one year the time for the payment of any annual installment due or hereafter to become due on the purchase price for lands sold under the act of Congress approved June 1, 1910, entitled "An act to authorize the survey and allotment of lands embraced within the limits of the Fort Berthold Reservation, in the State of North Dakota, and the sale and disposition of a portion of the surplus lands after allotment, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect," and any payment so extended may annually thereafter be extended for a period of one year in the same manner: Provided, That the last payment and all other payments must be made within a period not exceeding one year after the last payment becomes due by the terms of the act under which the entry was made: Provided further, That any and all payments must be made when due, unless the entryman applies for an extension and pays interest for one year, in advance, at 5 per cent per annum, upon the amount due as herein provided, and patent shall be withheld until full and final payment of the purchase price is made in accordance with the provisions hereof: And provided further, That failure to make any payment that may be due, unless the same be extended, or to make any extended payment at or before the time to which such payment has been extended, as herein provided, shall forfeit the entry, and the same shall be canceled and any and all payments theretofore made shall be forfeited.

Sec. 2. That the provisions of the act of April 13, 1912, entitled "An act extending the time of payment to certain homesteaders on the Cheyenne River Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, and on the Standing Rock Indian Reservation, in the States of South Dakota and North Dakota," shall apply to all homestead entries for said lands heretofore or hereafter made in the same manner it applies, by its terms, to entries made before its passage.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. THOMAS:

A bill (S. 5079) to authorize and empower the Secretary of the Interior to grant rights of way, permits, or licenses across or on Indian reservations, Indian lands, and Indian allotments, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. CHILTON:

A bill (S. 5080) to authorize the Director of the Census to enumerate the population of a State, Territory, or municipality (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on the Census.

By Mr. SHAFROTH:

A bill (S. 5081) granting an increase of pension to Daniel F. M. Drew; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BURLEIGH:

A bill (S. 5082) granting an increase of pension to George H. Erskine; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CLAPP:

A bill (S. 5083) granting an increase of pension to Fergus H. Merriman; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (by request):

A bill (S. 5084) to provide for compensation for mechanics, generally known as machinists and toolmakers, employed by the United States Government; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. McLEAN:

A bill (S. 5085) granting a pension to Sheldon S. S. Campbell (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LEWIS:

A bill (S. 5086) to authorize the President of the United States to suspend any tolls levied for use of the Panama Canal whenever the needs of the United States require; to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

By Mr. REED:

A bill (S. 5088) to further regulate canal tolls and to amend the Panama Canal act; to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

A bill (S. 5089) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing and requiring certain extensions to be made to the lines of the Capital Traction Co. and of the Anacostia & Potomac River Railroad Co., of the District of Columbia," approved June 4, 1900; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

OIL PRODUCTION IN OKLAHOMA.

Mr. GORE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 319) which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce is directed to investigate and report to the Senate at as early a date as practicable as to the cause of the recent reduction in the price of crude oil in the Ardmore oil field, in the State of Oklahoma, on the part of the Magnolia Pipe Line Co., and also as to whether corresponding changes have been made in the prices of the finished products manufactured from such oil.

Second, To make like investigation and report as to whether discriminations are practiced on the part of said company as between different producers of oil in the above-mentioned field, and especially as to whether any discrimination is practiced against the oil produced on Indian allotments.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 13811. An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution (S. Res. 316) submitted by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] on the 26th instant; also the substitute submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] on the 27th instant.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the resolution and substitute are likewise set for consideration to-day. The senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], who has been ill, and whose presence has been missed from our assembly with regret, has returned to-day to present a matter of importance to himself. I desire, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] likewise joining me, to yield to him that he may do so, and to ask that Senate resolution 316 and the substitute of the able Senator from New Hampshire may go over without prejudice, to be resumed on Monday.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is agreeable to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the resolution and the substitute will go over without prejudice.

TRADING IN COTTON.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a motion coming over from the preceding day, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] entered a motion to reconsider the votes by which Senate bill 110 was ordered to a third reading and passed.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] if he has any statement at all to make in relation to this matter. It has arisen here, and I was not to bring it up until the Senator saw me, if I understood him correctly. Has the Senator any objection to taking it up now?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, on yesterday the Senate passed Senate bill 110. After the passage of the bill my attention was called to section 6. Consequently, I entered a motion to reconsider.

I believe section 6 of the bill legalizes cotton pools, and legalizes exactly what the Supreme Court of the United States condemned in the case of the United States against Patten, Two hundred and twenty-sixth United States. I realize that if this motion is carried it will perhaps lead to extended debate. The junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] has been pushing this measure for a good many years, and it is a very meritorious measure. I do not want anything to happen that would jeopardize the bill, but I do think section 6 should be eliminated from the bill. I am assured by the Senator having charge of the bill that the section will go out in the House. Consequently I am not going to insist upon my motion, but I am going to rely upon that statement and withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, do I understand that the Senator is assured that the bill will be passed in a certain way in the House?

Mr. KENYON. I am assured that section 6 will go out in the House.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to say that I think all those who will carefully study the bill will at once see that this section is not at all pertinent to the bill. It does not add anything to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then why not reconsider the bill and strike it out? It is most extraordinary to give an assurance that the other body will do a certain thing.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The only reason why I asked to have that course taken was that I was quite sure that those who were responsible for the incorporation of this amendment in the bill deemed it impracticable to have it eliminated on the floor of the Senate without jeopardizing the bill by putting it back on the calendar. If it could be done without jeopardizing the bill, I should be perfectly willing to have it done. I am quite sure, however, there will be no necessity for retaining that particular amendment in the bill, because the balance of the bill amply provides against the contingency of any such thing arising in the future. That was the reason I asked that it take this course. I am morally sure that the amendment will go out of the bill in the House, and it was only to expedite business that I asked that this course be taken.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not want to interfere with the proposition at all, but the provisions of section 6 have been called to the attention of several Senators. Would not the Senator be willing to reconsider it here. It will take only a half a minute to reconsider and eliminate that section. It is an extraordinary course to say that if the measure is passed here it will be eliminated in the House.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Very well, if I can get unanimous consent that the bill will be reconsidered and then will pass immediately without interruption by other business, I would be perfectly willing to do that, if I can get unanimous consent to that effect.

Mr. WILLIAMS (to Mr. SMITH of South Carolina). Ask it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I ask that the bill be reconsidered and that immediately after the elimination of section 6 the bill shall then be voted upon without further debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to reconsider the votes by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I move to strike out section 6 of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina to strike out section 6.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE REPUBLIC COAL CO.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a motion coming over from a preceding day, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Motion by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell or lease certain public lands to the Republic Coal Co., a corporation, was rejected.

Mr. KENYON. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. REED. I ask the Senator from Iowa to withdraw that motion for the present. The Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] is going to ask that the matter lie over until Monday, and the Senator can then renew his motion, if he desires.

Mr. KENYON. I withdraw the motion on that statement.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I was not here when this joint resolution was considered by the Senate, and I should like to have an opportunity to look into it a little. I may be laboring under a misapprehension, but I have understood that it is nothing more nor less than a provision to enable this company to secure coal for its own use. I have no special interest in the company; in fact, I have some reasons for not being impelled to consider with much sympathy its request; but it is a company with a great deal of mileage in my State; it has constructed a line clear through to the coast; it is engaged in a vast amount of business; and if it actually needs these coal deposits simply for its own use, I can see no objection to its securing a supply of coal for that purpose. On that account I should like to have an opportunity to look into the joint resolution before the vote is taken to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. REED. I made the motion to reconsider, and I ask that the motion go over until——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Together with the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. REED. The motion to lay on the table is withdrawn, and I am now asking that the motion to reconsider be laid over until the next meeting of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I shall renew the motion to lay on the table, and ask unanimous consent that the motion to reconsider and the motion to lay it on the table shall both go over, as suggested by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I have no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection that the motion to reconsider, with the motion to lay on the table, shall go over until the next legislative day without prejudice? The Chair hears none.

IMPORTATION OF CONVICT-MADE GOODS.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to thank the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] for the courtesy extended to me, which I had no reason to expect, and which was done purely on his own account; but, notwithstanding my appreciation of his kindness, I do not wish to ask anything regarding a bill purely on the ground of personal courtesy.

On January 24 I introduced Senate bill 4161, which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures. A few days after that Representative HENSLEY introduced the same bill in the House. Shortly after I introduced the bill I was taken sick, and I have not been able to attend the sessions of the Senate since. I expect to leave the city the first of the coming week, to be gone some little time, in the hope of recuperating my strength before entering actively on my duties here.

The House bill to which I referred was passed on Wednesday last. It was passed, I understand, with practical unanimity, and was sent over to the Senate on Thursday of this week. The bill is now on the Vice President's table subject to call, and I rise to ask unanimous consent that the bill be laid before the Senate for present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. STONE. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Missouri asked unanimous consent, and it was to that that I rose. The Senator knows and all the Senate knows not only the friendly but affectionate relationship existing between the Senator from Missouri and myself. But notwithstanding that, I think the bill, if brought up now, might possibly pass; and if it did, it would carry great harm to the cotton growers of my section, in my opinion. I therefore feel compelled to object to its immediate consideration.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if I may be permitted I will say that the bill provides simply that manufactures of any kind of goods made abroad by convict labor or in which it enters shall be excluded from importation to this country. It is an elaboration or extension of the law, with penalties attached more drastic than have existed under the present law, and I hope——

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair interrupt the Senator from Missouri? There are two messages here from the House of Representatives, both with reference to convict-made goods, one being with reference to importations from abroad and the other with reference to interstate commerce in such goods. The Chair is uncertain as to which bill the Senator refers.

Mr. STONE. I refer to the first one mentioned by the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On importations from abroad?

Mr. STONE. On importations of convict-made goods from abroad.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] was of the opinion that it was the bill limiting the regulation of interstate commerce between the States in convict-made goods.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I was not. I understand just what it is. I think this House bill ought to go to the Finance Committee of the Senate. It really affects the tariff, because if it does take effect, in my opinion it repeals the clause of the tariff act which grants free importations of cotton bagging. That is my opinion of it, and that is the reason why I object to its immediate consideration.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I have no wish to interfere with the business of the Senate any more than possible, and in any event I can not take part in any controversy over a measure. Nevertheless, I believe I will move that, notwithstanding the objection, the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. LODGE. What is the bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is a House bill which has just come over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 14330) to prohibit the importation and entry of goods, wares, and merchandise made in whole or in part by convict, pauper, or detained labor, or made in whole or in part from materials which have been made in whole or in part or in any manner manipulated by convict or prison labor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The bill has not been referred to any committee since it came here.

Mr. LODGE. Under the rules it will have to go to a committee.

Mr. REED. Is this debatable?

The VICE PRESIDENT. A motion to take up a bill is not debatable.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A point of order can be made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A point of order can be made and debated.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to make a point of order that this House bill, under the rules, must go to the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will be compelled to sustain the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I suggest that it go to the Finance Committee.

Mr. STONE. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Manufactures. The Senate bill was referred to that committee and has been reported by that committee. The House bill is identical, and I see no reason why it should be sent to another committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia has moved to refer the bill to the Finance Committee. Under the rules of the Senate that is not amendable for the purpose of referring it to any other committee, and that is the first motion to be put, and it is not debatable.

Mr. REED. I did not understand the Senator from Georgia to make a motion; he made a suggestion.

Mr. STONE. No; he made a suggestion.

Mr. REED. It was a suggestion, and it was immediately followed by a motion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then I make the motion now.

Mr. STONE. I have made a motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let us see what the RECORD shows. So much of it as relates to the question will be read.

The Reporter read as follows:

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I suggest that it go to the Finance Committee.
Mr. STONE. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] is in order. The question is, Shall the bill be referred to the Committee on Manufactures?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Finance Committee has clearly jurisdiction of all questions relating to the importations of goods.

Mr. STONE. I think either committee has jurisdiction. The Senate bill was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. LODGE. A motion to refer is debatable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on referring the bill to the Committee on Manufactures. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call for a division.

Mr. SMOOT. Yeas and nays!

Mr. LODGE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. He is absent from the city, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. KERN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when Mr. SIMMONS's name was called). I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is absent on account of sickness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I transfer that pair so that he will stand paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH], and I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If he were present, I would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST] and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (after having voted in the affirmative). As the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has entered the Chamber and voted, I desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. BANKHEAD (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and let my vote stand.

Mr. JAMES (after having voted in the affirmative). I wish to inquire if the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. JAMES. I have a general pair with that Senator and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce for the day the absence of my colleague [Mr. CULBERSON] and to state that he is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT].

Mr. WALSH (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CLAPP. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who is absent from the Chamber on account of sickness. I therefore withhold my vote. I will let this statement stand for the day.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY]. He has a general pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN].

I wish also to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], who has a pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

Mr. HUGHES (after voting in the affirmative). I voted inadvertently. I neglected to announce my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON]. I therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—34.

So the bill was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In this connection the Chair desires to make a statement. The Chair was in error in ruling that the question of the reference of a bill to a committee is not debatable. The Chair was under the impression that the question was one of those questions which, under Rule XXII, are not debatable; but the Chair finds that the question is debatable. Therefore the ruling of the Chair heretofore made in reference to the matter will not stand as a precedent.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to say a word to the Senate with reference to the bill which has just been referred to the Manufactures Committee. A bill identical in all its parts with that bill, save for some two or three slight amendments, was introduced in the Senate, was referred to the Manufactures Committee, and was reported out of that committee favorably. Owing to the illness of my colleague [Mr. STONE], who introduced the bill, it has been impossible to have hearings as promptly as they would otherwise have been held. In the meantime, a similar bill was introduced in the House of Representatives. After being amended in two or three minor particulars, it was passed and sent to the Senate. On behalf of my colleague, I asked to have the bill laid on the table, to be subsequently called up. In view of the fact that an exactly similar bill had already been considered by the Manufactures Committee, I did not deem a further reference necessary.

I have one further word to add. There are two classes of legislation now pending with reference to prison-made goods. A number of bills have been introduced to empower the States to prohibit the shipment of goods made in the prisons of one State into another State. That class of legislation, of course, sharply raises the issue of placing some restrictions upon interstate commerce, and also pointedly raises the issue as to the advisability of undertaking to restrict by national legislation the employment of the prisoners in the United States prisons and in the State prisons. But the bill which has been under consideration this morning prohibits the importation of prison-made goods from abroad, and involves, of course, an entirely different question, because we are not concerned in the employment of prisoners in foreign prisons in the way we are interested in the employment of prisoners in our own country. Besides, it does not interfere with interstate commerce, but is a mere exercise of the right to regulate the character of goods which shall come into this country.

I wanted to make that statement, without pausing to discuss at this time the merits of the bill, because I desire the Senate to understand that this bill has nothing whatever to do with the employment of the prisoners in our American penal institutions.

It is a fact, Mr. President, which I remark in passing, that the competition between goods made in American prisons and those made by free labor is so obnoxious that in a number of the States laws have been passed prohibiting the importation of prison-made goods from one State to another; but those laws have been declared void by the courts. Nevertheless, their enactment is an evidence of the widespread public sentiment against bringing into competition with free labor the slave labor of prisoners; but whatever arguments may be advanced against applying the rule of exclusion as to goods which are made in American prisons, it would seem that a bill which proposes simply to protect our people from competition with the prison-made goods of other countries stands upon a higher ground, and that it ought to receive the attention and the favorable consideration of Congress.

Mr. President, I am speaking largely by the courtesy of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], who has a bill pending before the Senate. I simply make these preliminary remarks without intending at this time to discuss the merits of the question, but I wanted the Senate to be advised as to the distinction between these bills.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. SMITH of Georgia addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Mississippi, or has the Senator from Missouri yielded the floor?

Mr. REED. I have yielded the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the present consideration of this measure was asked for and was objected to, and yet it has been debated. The Chair ruled that the question of reference to a committee was not a debatable question. The Chair has since confessed that in that ruling the Chair was in error. But for that ruling the debate upon the question of reference might have taken place prior to the reference, instead of having to take place afterwards.

This is a question of the importation of goods in foreign commerce. Necessarily every bill affecting the importation of goods affects the revenues, and necessarily should go to the Committee on Finance. If that short explanation could have been made prior to the vote of the Senate, the Senate never would have cast the vote which a moment ago it did cast.

Mr. President, in reference to this general subject, I want to say this: Convicts have got to do something. What are you going to do with them? I am not talking now about the bill which has been referred to the Committee on Manufactures; objection has been made to its present consideration, and I shall not talk about it. But there is another bill here which provides that goods made by convict labor shall not be transported from one State to another. Take my State for an illustration. We were confronted in Mississippi with the question of what to do with our convicts. We kept them for a while on the close-confinement cell system; under that system men go crazy. Then we undertook to work them in various other ways; they were contracted out to men who worked them. Cruelty followed, abuse followed, and that system had to be abolished. Finally, the State of Mississippi said: "Well, the best thing we can do with our convicts is to put them at outdoor, healthy work, to have them do the sort of thing which most of them have been at work at all their lives—at raising cotton and corn and taking care of stock on farms." Whereupon we bought plantations and we put our convicts to work raising cotton and corn. The State of Mississippi is to-day the greatest cotton raiser in the world, except the Khedive of Egypt, and that cotton is made by convict labor. It is healthful labor, but not too severe; and yet the labor of the convict is made in that way to defray the expense which his crime and his support have caused to the State. What are you going to do? Are you going to keep convicts and feed them day by day and compel them to produce nothing for the benefit of the State whose laws they have outraged and whose treasury they are every day costing an immense amount of money? We thought we had solved the problem when we said: "We will put these men upon these plantations; put them at the very sort of labor they have been accustomed to all their lives; see to it that they work; see to it that they are not cruelly driven; and that they are safe, with guards around them, so that they can not escape."

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. One moment. Now, here comes along a bill to make the cotton raised by the State of Mississippi by convicts tabooed in interstate commerce. I would like for some Senator, who is wiser than I, to tell me what we are going to do with those men?

Mr. REED and Mr. HUGHES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Missouri, who first addressed the Chair?

Mr. HUGHES. I think the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. REED. I do not know whether the Senator from Mississippi heard my statement, and I do not know whether he intends to reply to what I said. I distinctly pointed out, however, that the bill to which I have referred is not the one which prohibits interstate commerce in convict-made goods.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that.

Mr. REED. It is another question in another bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not discussing the bill to which the Senator has referred, because the parliamentary usages of this body forbid me from discussing that measure, as present consideration was asked and refused. The Senator discussed it, but I have not discussed it; but since the Senator went off further into the general question of convict labor, I wanted to call the attention of the Senate to this matter, under the freedom of debate which exists here, and I want to ask Senators to stop and consider a moment when they come to the consideration of this other interstate bill which is upon the calendar, as I understand, if they are going to prevent the convicts from making or helping to make anything in the world, or rather going to refuse interstate-commerce privileges to anything in the world which they make or into which there enters any article which they make. What are you going to do with these prisoners?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield further to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], who is still on the floor? Does the Senator from Missouri hold the floor for the purpose of an interrogatory?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. The Senator has just stated that I proceeded to discuss the question after present consideration had been refused.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What the Senator did debate was the reference of this bill to the committee, and that was after the question of reference had been decided by the Senate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it was only by the courtesy of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am doing it by the courtesy of the Senate, too.

Mr. REED. I want to ask the Senator if he meant to criticize me for speaking upon a question that was not before the Senate? If so, I want the Senator to bear in mind that he is doing the same thing at this present moment of time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And I stated, as my excuse for doing it, that the Senator from Missouri had just done it. That is the only reason——

Mr. OVERMAN. I call for the regular order.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The regular order is called for, and, of course, we are both out of order.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi still retain the floor?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I still retain the floor.

Mr. OVERMAN. I call for the regular order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Missouri further?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would yield to the Senator from Missouri, but the Senator from North Carolina has called for the regular order, which puts both the Senator from Missouri and myself in our chairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair wishes to apologize to the Senate. The Chair understood the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] to call for order in the Senate; but the Senator from North Carolina having called for the regular order, the regular order is the bill——

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask if morning business has closed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business has not been declared closed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13453) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

MINING ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is compelled to rule, previously to entertaining the motion of the Senator from Oregon, that there is a motion undisposed of that now takes precedence. We are in the morning hour. The motion which has been offered by the Senator from Montana is now the regular order.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask what this is?

The SECRETARY. It is a motion made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] to discharge the Committee on Mines and Mining from the further consideration of the bill (S. 4898) to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, potassium, and sodium on the public domain, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that that may go over until Monday.

Mr. MYERS. I heartily concur in the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being consent, the matter goes over until Monday.

Mr. LODGE. It goes over without prejudice?

Mr. MYERS. I ask that it be done without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is so ruled, that the matter goes over without prejudice.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I now renew my motion that the Senate resume the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13453) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill, beginning at the bottom of page 27.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, under the subhead "Philippine Scouts," on page 28, line 6, after "$1,250,000," to insert: "Provided, That of the amount herein appropriated the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to expend $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the improvement and rendering available for use as maneuvering camps, rifle and artillery ranges, either of said tracts of land referred to hereinafter, and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized in his discretion to accept title to one or the other of the following tracts of land: One tract of land of approximately 5,000 acres in the vicinity of Tullahoma, in the State of Tennessee, which certain citizens have offered to donate to the United States, and which has been inspected by the commission authorized under the joint resolution approved February 24, 1911, and the other tract of land of 4,000 acres at or near Anniston, in the State of Alabama, which has heretofore been inspected by Col. Stephen C. Mills, Inspector General United States Army, as shown by the report submitted by him to the War Department on the 12th day of January, 1912: Provided further, That neither of the aforesaid tracts of land shall be accepted by the Secretary of War unless fee-simple title without encumbrances shall be conveyed by proper and sufficient deeds to the United States for the purpose of establishing a maneuvering camp and for the maneuvering of troops, establishing and maintaining camps of instruction for rifle and artillery ranges, and for mobilizing and assembling of troops from such States as may be designated by the Secretary of War: Provided further, That upon acquisition of title to the land mentioned herein the Secretary of War is hereby further authorized to locate and establish upon said land a permanent maneuver camp for the troops of the United States Army, and to establish and maintain thereon camps of instruction for rifle and artillery ranges and for the mobilization and assembling of troops from such States as may be designated by the Secretary of War."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator having the bill in charge to the provision beginning with line 16, page 29, going down to and including the amendment which will be next in order, on line 24. That provision reads:

> That hereafter the allotment to any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia from the annual appropriation made by section 1661, Revised Statutes, as amended, shall be available for the purposes specified by law only under such conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War to secure effective organizational field or camp service for instruction and generally increased field efficiency on the part of the Organized Militia.

Under the acts sought to be amended by this language the amount each State is to receive from Federal funds is fixed. The States know just what they can depend upon to further the military service. Such a system is necessarily productive of stable and dependable results. To leave the States and the War Department in uncertainty, as this amendment provides for, would tend to retrogression and not to progress, in my opinion. The States and the War Department have acted under section 1661 for 10 years and under the amendment of May 27 for 6 years. Such progress has been made under them that the militia forces are considered a dependable part of the military strength of this country. Now, we find an amendment to this bill leaving it absolutely in the hands of the Secretary of War to designate any amount that may be, in his discretion, for the maintenance of the State militia and the Territorial or District of Columbia militia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Utah allow the Chair to be so bold as to make a query for the Chair's guidance? Is it the contention of the Senator from Utah that this provision under similar conditions would work a repeal of the provisions of what is known as the Hull bill, passed 14 years ago? The Chair is very much interested in that question.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it is certainly a suspension of them, Mr. President, and I think that is the intention. I wish to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if that is not the intention, and if the committee really intends to ask the Senate to adopt this provision as it passed the House?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the particular provision to which the Senator directs the attention of the Senate is between lines 16 and 24, on page 29. It is a provision which was inserted in the bill by the House of Representatives, and the bill came over here with that provision in it. The Senate committee has not made any change in that respect.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the provision to which objection has been most generally made is the second proviso, beginning in line 24, on page 29, going down to and inclusive of line 7, on page 30, which the subcommittee, at the suggestion of the Secretary of War, has concluded to move to strike out.

With reference to the other provision, the Secretary of War, in a communication addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives on the 29th of January, 1914, in reference to the very provision which the Senator is now discussing, stated the reasons for desiring to have this provision in the bill. That statement is amplified and enlarged by the Secretary of War in testimony which was given by him before the House committee and before the Senate committee. Here is what he says in reference to the matter:

> I submit herein an item of legislation designed to regulate the expenditure of the annual appropriation for the Organized Militia made by section 1661, Revised Statutes, as amended, requesting that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs for consideration as to its inclusion in the act making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and, in case of favorable action by the committee, suggesting its insertion immediately after the item "Encampment and maneuvers, Organized Militia."

The item which he suggests is the very item to which the Senator is objecting. Now, here are the reasons:

> The necessity for this legislation arises from a late decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury, which practically leaves the Secretary of War powerless to exercise proper supervisory control over the expenditure of Federal appropriations for the Organized Militia.
> That such control is absolutely essential in order to insure a proper return to the Federal Government for its outlay in behalf of the Organized Militia has been amply demonstrated by experience and will be made clear by the War Department in such hearings as the military committees may desire.

That is the purpose of it. The purpose is to enable the Secretary of War to have some supervisory control over practically $4,000,000 which is appropriated by Congress for the support of the Organized Militia. As it is now, there is no supervisory control. There is a lack of unification in the National Guard. There is a lack of system. The purpose of this provision is to bring the expenditure of these moneys within some sort of reasonable jurisdiction of the War Department. The committee of the Senate was impressed with the evidence given before the committee and thought the provision ought to be inserted not only for the protection of the appropriation made by Congress annually but for the upbuilding and protection of the National Guard as well.

Mr. SMOOT. As I understand the Senator, then, the committee will move to strike out the second provision?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to submit some remarks on that point, but if it is going to be stricken out I shall say no more in regard to it. It may be that the State militias and the Territorial militias are unduly exercised over this matter, but I know they feel that the provision in this bill, put in there by the House, virtually suspends the amendment that was made on May 27, under which we have been operating for six years, and that it virtually suspends the provision of section 1661, under which we have been operating for 10 years.

If the committee have considered this matter and feel that the construction placed upon it by the men most deeply interested in the State militias is not correct, then, of course, I shall say no more.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. SMOOT. I gladly yield.

Mr. DU PONT. I wish to assure the Senator from Utah that this matter has been very carefully considered by the committee. I desire to call his attention also to the fact that the Secretary of War has every reason not to injure the efficiency of the State militia, but to build it up and to weld it into one harmonious system. In order to effect this, however, he certainly must have some control over the expenditure of the money, in view of the vast sum we are appropriating every year—$4,000,000. It would seem unbusinesslike and inappropriate in every way that the Secretary of War should not have some general control over the manner in which this money is to be disbursed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator there for just a moment?

Mr. DU PONT. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at page 4107 when the bill was under consideration in the House. He will find stated there at length an explanation of the necessity for this amendment to the bill from the viewpoint of the War Department.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I had not looked up the discussion in the House; but I did know that the House put in this provision, and also the second proviso that the Senate committee have wisely decided, in my opinion, to strike from the bill.

I fully agree that it is absolutely essential that the Secretary of War shall have some supervision over the State militias, and I do not believe any of the State militias would object in any way to the exercise of that power.

It seems to me that the results during the last 10 years, and particularly during the last 6 years, have been marvelous. It now looks as if the State militias are beginning to be a power and are beginning to be put into a position whereby they will be an assistance and a help to our Regular Army in case of need.

I wanted to call attention to this matter. I am very glad indeed that the committee have decided to strike out the second provision, and I hope and trust that the wording of the first provision spoken of by me will not have any ill effect upon any of our Territorial militias.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, before passing the provision which has been under discussion I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee with regard to what is known as the Hull Act. I am not familiar with it myself. I desire to know whether under the provisions of that act the distribution of the moneys to the State militias is not regulated by law instead of being left as this provision would leave it—somewhat in the discretion of the Secretary of War?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is apportioned among the several States, I think.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is apportioned upon some rule, is it not? I simply infer that. I am not familiar with it myself. If that is true, it seems to me very much to the advantage of the State guards of the country to know upon what they can depend in the way of an appropriation. The law informs them——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will suggest to the Senator that this does not change the allotment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; but it invests the Secretary, if I understand it correctly, with a discretion under which he may change the allotment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think he could change the allotment. It is not the purpose of the committee to change the method of allotment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am quite confident that that is what the different State guards are apprehensive of; and I am very strongly inclined to think that that is exactly what the language provides.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In just a moment. This is the language:

> That hereafter the allotment to any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia from the annual appropriation made by section 1661, Revised Statutes, as amended, shall be available for the purposes specified by law only under such conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War to secure effective organizational field or camp service—

And so forth.

We have made admirable progress under the law as it now stands. I am not a member of the committee and have not given the subject much thought. I have had my attention called to it, however, by the adjutant general of the State of Wisconsin, who has been long in the service and on whose judgment I place great reliance. He is very, very much exercised over the effect of the proposed change in the law.

I beg the pardon of the Senator from Wyoming. I now yield to him.

Mr. WARREN. I only wanted to say that as I understand this item I think it is not an important one, and in the committee, so far as I was concerned, I felt it would be safe to leave it in. The object of having certain rules and regulations is to secure uniformity between the Organized Militia and the United States Regular Army, so that the militia may be an effective part of the Army when brought into service.

I think the law specifically provides the allotment of funds; but, then, I do not consider these facts to be important in any manner as to the amount, after striking out, as we have done, the second part, which related to funds.

Now, as to the rules, if I understand them aright, for instance, in encampments they provide that the Army and militia shall meet together. Two years ago, or a year ago, in one of the States the adjutant general undertook to refuse to go into camp with the United States troops, and asked that he might go into camp with the militia at the same time under the regulations, but the militia, by themselves, on the ground—a sub-rosa one—that they were not sufficiently drilled, but on the open excuse generally that it was inconvenient, and so forth, the idea being that the militia and the Army together, of which they may be a part, should form one grand corps, to be in camps together and to be armed and equipped identically, or as nearly so as may be. I think that is the only intention.

As to the second provision, providing that the States could make no contracts until the money was specially appropriated, and so forth, we struck that out.

Mr. DU PONT. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield the floor. I have not the correspondence at hand which brought this matter to my attention. I perhaps, before the provision is disposed of finally in the Senate, can get access to my files and inform myself better with regard to it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In this connection I desire to move to strike out the provisio, on page 29, line 24, after the words "Organized Militia," down to and including the word "appropriated," in line 7, page 30.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 29, line 24, after the words "Organized Militia," strike out the colon and the word "Provided" down to and including the word "appropriated," on page 30, in the following words:

> And provided further, That hereafter the Secretary of War shall cause to be annually estimated the amount necessary to carry out the provisions of the act to promote the efficiency of the militia, and for other purposes, approved June 22, 1906, as amended by the act approved May 27, 1908, and no money shall be expended under those acts except as shall from time to time be appropriated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. I have just come into the Chamber, and, before passing from the proviso on page 29, I wish to state that I have some correspondence from some of the State adjutant generals in reference to that matter. Has the entire proviso, beginning on page 29, been stricken out?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Only the second proviso.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Just the second proviso has been stricken out.

Mr. JONES. As to the first proviso, I have letters from adjutant generals suggesting that that matter ought to have been referred to the National Militia Board which Congress has provided for. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee whether the matter has ever been referred to that board for its opinion as to the wisdom of the legislation contained in the first proviso?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will state to the Senator that when the bill was up for consideration in the House the Secretary of War forwarded to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, on the 3d of February, a memorandum in explanation of the necessity of the particular proviso which the Senator is discussing, and in that says, under subdivision 5 of his letter:

5. These facts were presented to the National Militia Board, composed of officers of the Organized Militia. They formulated and submitted to the Secretary of War regulations to correct the above conditions. These regulations, having been approved by the Secretary of War, were embodied in Circular No. 2, War Department, Division of Militia Affairs, series of 1913.

The facts which he mentions are the facts which necessitated the enactment of this legislation.

Mr. JONES. So this proviso is really in accordance with the recommendation of the board?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I so understand.

Mr. JONES. Of course if that is true, the objection made in this letter has no foundation.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I may be mistaken in the assumption which I make, but I ask the Senator to read the statement contained in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at page 4108; and if I am mistaken, I would be glad to have the Senator call my attention to it when the bill is in the Senate.

Mr. JONES. Very well.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for subsistence of the Army, on page 31, line 10, after the words "national rifle match," to strike out "And provided" and insert "Provided further," so as to read:

Provided, That the sum of $12,000 is authorized to be expended for supplying meals or furnishing commutation of rations to enlisted men of the Regular Army and the Organized Militia who may be competitors in the national rifle match: Provided further, That no competitor shall be entitled to commutation of rations in excess of $1.50 per day, and when meals are furnished no greater expense than that sum per man per day for the period the contest is in progress shall be incurred.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for subsistence of the Army, on page 32, line 17, after the word "Army," to strike out "$9,139,666.39" and insert "$9,802,141.39," and in line 21, after the word "Army," to insert "and the officers and the enlisted men of the Army shall be permitted to purchase subsistence supplies from the Navy and Marine Corps at the same price as is charged the officers and the enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps," so as to read:

For payments: Of commutation of rations to the cadets at the United States Military Academy in lieu of the regular established ration, at the rate of 30 cents per ration; of the regulation allowances of commutation in lieu of rations to enlisted men on furlough, enlisted men and male and female nurses when stationed at places where rations in kind can not be economically issued, and when traveling on detached duty where it is impracticable to carry rations of any kind, enlisted men selected to contest for places or prizes in departments and Army rifle competitions while traveling to and from places of contest, male and female nurses on leaves of absence, applicants for enlistment, and military convicts while traveling under orders; of commutation of rations in lieu of the regular established ration for members of the Nurse Corps (female) while on duty in hospital, at 40 cents per ration, and for enlisted men, applicants for enlistment while held under observation, and military convicts sick therein, at the rate of 30 cents per ration (except that at the general hospital at Fort Bayard, N. Mex., 50 cents per ration and at other general hospitals 40 cents per ration are authorized for enlisted patients therein) to be paid to the surgeon in charge; advertising; for providing prizes to be established by the Secretary of War for enlisted men of the Army who graduate from the Army schools for bakers and cooks, the total amount of such prizes at the various schools not to exceed $900 per annum; for other necessary expenses incident to the purchase, testing, care, preservation, issue, sale, and accounting for subsistence supplies for the Army, $9,802,141.39: Provided further, That the officers and the enlisted men of the Navy and the Marine Corps shall be permitted to purchase subsistence supplies at the same price as is charged the officers and the enlisted men of the Army; and the officers and the enlisted men of the Army shall be permitted to purchase subsistence supplies from the Navy and Marine Corps at the same price as is charged the officers and the enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 33, line 19, before the words "enlisted men," to insert "and," and in the same line, before the words "contract surgeons," to insert "for," so as to read:

Regular supplies, Quartermaster Corps: Regular supplies of the Quartermaster Corps, including their care and protection, consisting of stoves and heating apparatus required for heating offices, hospitals, barracks and quarters, and recruiting stations, and United States military prisons; also ranges, stoves, coffee roasters, and appliances for cooking and serving food at posts, in the field, and when traveling, and repair and maintenance of such heating and cooking appliances; authorized issues of candles and matches; for furnishing heat and light for the authorized allowance of quarters for officers and enlisted men; for contract surgeons and acting dental surgeons when stationed at and occupying public quarters at military posts, for officers of the National Guard attending service and garrison schools, and for recruits, guards, hospitals, storehouses, offices, the buildings erected at private cost, in the operation of the act approved May 31, 1902.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for regular supplies, Quartermaster Corps, on page 34, line 7, before the words "at such places," to strike out "officers" and insert "offices," and in line 16, after the word "libraries," to insert "for the purchase and issue of instruments, office furniture, stationery, and other authorized articles for the use of officers' schools at the several military posts," so as to read:

For post bakeries, including bake ovens and apparatus pertaining thereto, and the repair thereof; for ice machines and their maintenance where required for the health and comfort of the troops and for cold storage; ice for issue to organizations of enlisted men and offices at such places as the Secretary of War may determine, and for preservation of stores; for the construction, operation, and maintenance of laundries at military posts in the United States and its island possessions; for the authorized issues of laundry materials for use of general prisoners confined at military posts without pay or allowances, and for applicants for enlistment while held under observation; authorized issues of soap; for hire of employees; for the necessary furniture, textbooks, paper, and equipment for the post schools and libraries; for the purchase and issue of instruments, office furniture, stationery, and other authorized articles for the use of officers' schools at the several military posts; commercial newspapers, market reports, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for regular supplies, Quartermaster Corps, on page 36, line 19, after the word "paid," to strike out "$7,700,000" and insert "$8,351,264.85," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the funds received from such sales and in payment for such laundry work shall be used to defray the cost of operation of said ice, laundry, and electric plants; and the sales and expenditures herein provided for shall be accounted for in accordance with the methods prescribed by law; and any sums remaining after such cost of maintenance and operation have been defrayed shall be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the appropriation from which the cost of operation of such plant is paid, $8,351,264.85.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I request that that amendment be passed over for the present. I may want to suggest an amendment there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, the amendment will be passed over.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for horses for Cavalry, Artillery, Engineers, etc., on page 39, line 19, after the word "place," to strike out "$500,000" and insert "$565,285," and in line 20, after the word "available," to strike out "And provided further, That hereafter no part of this or any other appropriation shall be expended for defraying expenses of officers, enlisted men, or horses in attending or taking part in horse shows," so as to read:

Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the purchase of any horses below the standard set by Army Regulations for Cavalry and Artillery horses, except when purchased as remounts or for instruction of cadets at the United States Military Academy: And provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for polo ponies except for West Point Military Academy, and such ponies shall not be used at any other place, $565,285, and the sum of $200,000 of this appropriation is made immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 40, line 6, before the word "Artillery," to strike out "Seacoast" and insert "Coast," so as to read:

Barracks and quarters: For barracks, quarters, stables, storehouses, magazines, administration and office buildings, sheds, shops, and other buildings necessary for the shelter of troops, public animals, and stores, and for administration purposes, except those pertaining to the Coast Artillery.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 40, line 22, after the word "tents," to insert the numerals "$2,123,997."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for barracks and quarters, on page 40, line 24, after the words "enlisted men," to insert: "Provided further, That not exceeding the sum of $6,000 of this appropriation may be expended, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, for the construction of a rostrum in the national cemetery in the Presidio of San Francisco, Cal.: Provided further, That $60,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the construction of a library building for the Army Service Schools at Fort Leavenworth," and on page 41, line 12, after the words "Secretary of War," to strike out "$2,123,997," so as to read:

Provided, That no part of the moneys so appropriated shall be paid for commutation of fuel or quarters to officers or enlisted men: Provided further, That not exceeding the sum of $6,000 of this appropriation may be expended, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, for the construction of a rostrum in the national cemetery in the Presidio of San Francisco, Cal.: Provided further, That $60,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the construction of a library building for the Army Service Schools at Fort Leavenworth: And provided further, That the number of and total sum paid for civilian employees in the Quartermaster Corps shall be limited to the actual requirements of the service, and that no employee therein shall receive a salary of more than $150 per month, except upon the approval of the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for transportation of the Army and its supplies, on page 44, line 15, after the words "Pacific Oceans," to insert: "Provided further, That hereafter private mounts of officers in excess of the authorized mounts may be shipped on Government bill of lading with authorized mounts, and reimbursement collected for transportation charges on such excess mounts," so as to read:

For expenses of sailing public transports and other vessels on the various rivers, the Gulf of Mexico, and the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans: Provided further, That hereafter private mounts of officers in excess of the authorized mounts may be shipped on Government bill of lading with authorized mounts, and reimbursement collected for transportation charges on such excess mounts: And provided further, That authority is hereby granted the Secretary of War to sell or otherwise dispose of in accordance with law and regulations the United States Army interisland transports Seward and Wright, $10,064,645.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to offer the following amendment at page 44, after line 19. I move to insert the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That $75,000 of the appropriation hereby made shall be available for additional pay to employees on harbor boats, quartermaster's service, in lieu of subsistence.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. On page 44, in line 23, strike out "$10,064,645" and insert "$10,164,645."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 45, line 5, after the word "stations," to strike out "$475,000" and insert "$495,000," so as to make the clause read:

Roads, walks, wharves, and drainage: For the construction and repair by the Quartermaster Corps of roads, walks, and wharves; for payment of extra-duty pay to enlisted men employed in opening roads and in building wharves; for the pay of employees; for the disposal of drainage; for dredging channels; and for care and improvement of grounds at military posts and stations, $495,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 59, after line 17, to insert:

The President may, in his discretion, award suitable medals to officers and enlisted men now, or subsequent to 1860, in the military service of the United States, or to their legal representatives, who actually participated or who may hereafter take part in exceptional and notable battles.

The battles for which medals are to be awarded shall be designated by the President upon the recommendation of a board of officers to be approved by the Secretary of War.

Such medals shall be suitably inscribed with the name of the soldier and that of the battle in which he participated, and no medal shall be awarded except upon the recommendation of a board of officers appointed for such purpose by the Secretary of War, which in this connection shall consider all official records as well as other contemporaneous sources of information not of an official character and determine whether the soldier has actually taken part in the battle referred to, and to carry out the purposes of these provisions the sum of $1,200, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that that amendment beginning at line 18, on page 59, down to and including the word "appropriated," in line 14, page 60, be disagreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NELSON in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, on page 61, line 1, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$750,000" and insert "$2,100,000," and in line 5, after the word "same," to insert "and the purchase of materials therefor," so as to make the clause read:

Field artillery for Organized Militia: For the purpose of manufacturing field artillery material for the Organized Militia of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, without cost to the said States, Territories, or the District of Columbia, but to remain the property of the United States and to be accounted for in the manner now prescribed by law, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, under such regulations as he may prescribe, on the requisitions of the governors of the several States and Territories or the commanding general of the Militia of the District of Columbia, to issue said artillery material to the Organized Militia; and the sum of $2,100,000 is hereby appropriated and made immediately available and to remain available until the end of the fiscal year 1916, for the manufacture and issue of the articles constituting the same, and the purchase of materials therefor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 61, line 9, after the words "District of Columbia," to insert "and the purchase of materials therefor," and in line 12, after the date "nineteen hundred and sixteen," to strike out "$1,000,000" and insert "$3,000,000," so as to make the clause read:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 61, after line 13, to insert:

For the purchase and erection, by the Secretary of War, of a suitable monument on the grave of Maj. Gen. Henry W. Lawton, in Arlington Cemetery, Va., $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to recur for a moment to page 36, line 19, an amendment which was passed over. The amount reported by the Committee should be decreased from $8,351,264.85 to $8,155,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to offer an amendment, to come in on page 8, after line 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, after line 3, insert:

Signaling equipment for coast-defense posts: For the purchase of mortars, rockets, shells, Very pistols, heliographs, acetylene lanterns, flag kits, and other signaling equipment to supply coast-defense posts for signaling purposes, $12,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. If the amendments are completed, I offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, after the word "prescribe," at the end of line 23, insert:

Provided further, That on and after the passage of this act all permanent officers of the Quartermaster Corps created by the act making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, approved August 24, 1912, on the active list and below the grade of brigadier general shall be arranged in each grade according to date of original entry into either the Quartermaster, Subsistence, or Pay Departments: And provided further, That all officers who received permanent commissions as captains in either the Quartermaster, Subsistence, or Pay Departments as the result of the act of February 2, 1901, shall be considered to rank as from that date: And provided further, That when an officer shall be promoted to the next higher grade he shall take rank therein according to the provisions of this act as already set forth.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I merely desire to say that the purpose of the amendment is to cure what seems to me an injustice at the time of the passage of the act of 1912, and an act of injustice to a few officers in the Commissary Department and Subsistence Department, and to give them the rank and promotion to which I think they are entitled by the date of entry. I would be very glad if the amendment could be adopted on this bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say that the committee had the matter under very serious consideration and discussed it quite at length. While the amendment might relieve the situation as to one or two officers, as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, it would work a hardship as to others, and the War Department particularly objects to it. In view of the argument which they have adduced in the way of a protest, I think I will have to make a point of order against the proposed amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts desire to be heard?

Mr. LODGE. Not on the point of order. I could not resist the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the point of order?

Mr. LODGE. That it is general legislation, I assume.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That it is general legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I submit the letter from the Acting Secretary of War for printing in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 20, 1914.

The Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
United States Senate.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith the amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. LODGE to the bill (H. R. 13453) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, which, in brief, proposes to readjust the lineal rank of officers of the Quartermaster Corps by placing them all on one list for promotion according to the length of their commissioned service in the former Quartermaster, Subsistence, and Pay Departments and the present Quartermaster Corps.

These departments were consolidated into the present Quartermaster Corps by the act of Congress of August 24, 1912. That act provided that: "The officers now holding commissions as officers of the said departments * * * shall constitute one list, on which they shall be arranged according to rank. So long as any officers shall remain on said list, any vacancy occurring therein shall be filled, if possible, from among such officers, by selection if the vacancy occurs in a grade above that of colonel, and, if the vacancy occurs in a grade not above that of colonel, by the promotion of an officer who would have been entitled to that particular vacancy if the consolidation of the departments hereby prescribed had never occurred."

In any such consolidation as was made in creating the present Quartermaster Corps four methods of the adjustment of rank and promotion are presented as possible solutions, viz:

(a) One list for rank and promotion according to length of commissioned service in the Army.

As many officers in the Quartermaster Corps came into commissioned service from civil life, and generally at a more advanced age than those transferred to the corps, this method would manifestly be unjust, and should not be seriously considered.

(b) One list for rank and promotion according to rank held at consolidation.

This plan has been proposed at different times, but it has the great disadvantage that promotion did not take place equally in the former departments, and therefore this method would make permanent the temporary inequalities which existed at the particular date of consolidation.

In this connection the difference between the relative rank of officers in different branches and the time which will elapse before officers will receive promotion must be clearly distinguished. For example, the commission of A may antedate that of B by several years, yet B may in fact be nearer his promotion than A. In the preceding grade the reverse condition may have existed, and this is why it would not be fair to take the inequalities that existed at a particular time and make them permanent.

(c) One list for rank according to the rank held at consolidation and three lists for promotion, i. e., for purposes of promotion, the former quartermaster officers to form one list, the former subsistence officers a second list, and the former pay officers a third list. Then when a vacancy occurs that officer to be promoted who would have been promoted if consolidation had not taken place.

This is the present law and has brought no change in the officers' rank and time for promotion.

(d) One list for rank and promotion according to length of commissioned service in the former staff departments and the present Quartermaster Corps.

This is the plan proposed in the bill herewith, which makes no distinction between officers who entered their former department as majors and those who entered as captains.

According to this plan, all officers of the consolidated corps would be rearranged into one list, based on their length of commissioned service, as in the staff departments. This rearrangement would be independent of their age and of commissioned service previous to joining staff department. It would result in making considerable changes in the present lineal rank of these officers and affect the promotion in almost every case. It would take no account of the reasons with reference to promotion that may have affected officers in joining one staff department or another. It would change the promotion to which, before consolidation, they were entitled. There is no reason for such rearrangement that did not exist at the time of consolidation.

The question of the proper arrangement of these officers as to rank and promotion was considered very carefully by Congress at the time of consolidation, and this plan was adopted in order that the actual promotion of officers should not be changed. As promotion is important, it was justly given much consideration and was effectively safeguarded.

It may happen under the present law that an officer may obtain his promotion before another (formerly in a different department) who is his senior in rank. In other words, in the present Quartermaster Corps it is possible that one day an officer may be junior to another and the next day be promoted so as to be his senior. While this is an inconsistency, it can not be avoided without setting aside the rights of promotion they held with respect to each other before consolidation.

In any consolidation of this kind a certain amount of criticism of any proposal is to be anticipated. In this particular consolidation there is no method of remedying such minor inconsistencies without doing grave injustice in important fundamentals. For example, in the bill herewith, in order to remedy minor inconsistencies, it is proposed to set aside rights of promotion which existed prior to consolidation and were then unquestioned.

The act of consolidation guarantees the rights of promotion existing prior to consolidation at the expense of some inconsistencies in the matter of rank. This is believed to be the most equitable solution possible.

In view of these considerations, I am unable to indorse the proposed amendment, and trust that it may not receive favorable consideration by your committee.

Very respectfully,

HENRY BRECKINRIDGE,
Acting Secretary of War.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, which must be my excuse for saying a word at this time concerning the bill.

The appropriations which are made by the Senate increase those of the House about seven and a half million dollars in round numbers. The total increase in this bill over that of last year is about the same amount. The principal items of increase are those which appear in the last amendments.

Mr. WARREN. May I interrupt the Senator to call attention to one point?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator speaks of the bill of last year in comparison. I do not want him to overlook the fact that last year there was an insufficient amount, even with the lower enlistments, and we have already before us estimates of between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000 to cover deficiencies.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator is mistaken. The last appropriation was a profligate one. I have a high authority for making that statement.

Mr. WARREN. Did I understand the Senator to say that there is not an estimate now asking for three and a half million dollars?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no; but I say that the total appropriation last year was in excess of what it should have been.

Mr. WARREN. What I refer to is the Senator's comparison. The Senator will remember that added to the regular bill must be summed up the deficiencies which have to be covered by appropriations at the end of the year.

Mr. THOMAS. I know, Mr. President, that appropriations are not binding nowadays upon the departments at all.

They not only expend money which is appropriated, but they also expend money which is not appropriated, and we must make up for the deficiencies at every succeeding Congress.

But, Mr. President, my purpose, of course, is not to oppose the passage of this bill. I merely want to say—I will not say I gave my assent—but, because of the representations made concerning them, I made no objection to these larger appropriations. Those representations were not at all convincing to me, and I am not going to reproduce them or recapitulate them here. I merely wish to say with reference to this bill that, in view of the disturbed condition on the border, I should not feel justified, and did not feel justified, in making any objection to these increased amounts. That being the case, of course, I am not in the position of opposing my associates upon this committee, but I am simply making a statement with reference to the attitude which I occupy concerning the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 13765, being the Military Academy appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 13765) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That course will be pursued, in the absence of objection. The Chair hears none.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, under the subhead "Permanent establishment," on page 2, line 5, after the word "cadets," to strike out "$375,000," and insert "$390,000," so as to read:

For pay of cadets, $390,000.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. On page 2, line 15, I move to strike out the word "instructor" and to insert "professor"; in line 16, to strike out the word "major" and to insert the words "lieutenant colonel"; in the same line, to strike out the word "captain" and to insert the word "major" and also in the same line, to strike out "$600" and to insert in lieu thereof "$500."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 15, after the word "one," it is proposed to strike out "instructor" and insert "professor"; in line 16, after the word "engineering," to strike out the word "major" and to insert "lieutenant colonel"; and in the same line, after the word "as," to strike out "captain, $600" and to insert "major, $500," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of one professor of practical military engineering (lieutenant colonel), in addition to pay as major, $500.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 3, line 20, after the word "Cavalry," to strike out "and Artillery detachment" and insert "Artillery, and Engineer detachments," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of the Military Academy band, field musicians, general Army service, Cavalry, Artillery, and Engineer detachments, and enlisted men on detached service, and extra pay for enlisted men on special duty.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 4, after the word "service," to strike out "$5,500" and insert "$4,900," so as to make the clause read:

Additional pay for length of service, $4,900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 14, to insert:

For extra pay of one noncommissioned officer in charge of Army service detachment mess, $72.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 22, after the word "discharge," to strike out "$1,082" and insert "$1,082.48," so as to make the clause read:

Travel allowances to enlisted men on discharge, $1,082.48.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 24, after the word "discharge," to strike out "$10,226" and insert "$10,226.60," so as to make the clause read:

Clothing not drawn due enlisted men on discharge, $10,226.60.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 1, after the words "enlisted men," to strike out "$1,275" and insert "$1,275.16," so as to make the clause read:

Interest on deposits due enlisted men, $1,275.16.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 5, after the word "included," to strike out "$549" and insert "$549.50," so as to make the clause read:

For extra pay of three enlisted men employed as clerks in the office of the adjutant, United States Military Academy, at 50 cents each per day, Sundays and legal holidays included, $549.50.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 13, after the words "per day," to strike out "$191" and insert "$191.63," so as to make the clause read:

For extra pay of one enlisted man employed as watchman, at 35 cents per day, $191.63.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 15, after the words "per day," to strike out "$159" and insert "$159.69," so as to make the clause read:

For extra pay of one enlisted man employed as trumpeter at the cadet barracks, at 35 cents per day, $159.69.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 3, to strike out:

For pay of one noncommissioned officer in charge of Army service detachment mess, $72.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 14, before the word "laborers," to strike out "12" and insert "9," and in line 18, after the words "per day," to strike out "$1,460" and insert "$1,460.48," so as to make the clause read:

For extra pay of 13 enlisted men (cavalrymen), 2 teamsters, 9 laborers employed in keeping clean the equipment used by cadets in riding and equitation other than military, and 2 laborers for harrowing, sprinkling, and assisting in caring for the new riding hall, at 35 cents each per day, $1,460.48.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 10, before the word "cents," to strike out "30" and insert "35," so as to make the clause read:

For extra pay of three teamsters (artillerymen), at 35 cents each per day, $383.25.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Pay of civilians," on page 10, line 19, after "$4,000," to insert "Provided, That hereafter the four above-named civilian instructors shall have the same allowances with respect to quarters, fuel, and light as those of a second lieutenant," so as to make the clause read:

For two civilian instructors in Spanish, at $2,000 per year each, to be employed under rules prescribed by the Secretary of War, $4,000: Provided, That hereafter the four above-named civilian instructors shall have the same allowances with respect to quarters, fuel, and light as those of a second lieutenant.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, after line 4, to insert:

Provided, That hereafter these three civilian instructors shall have the same allowances with respect to quarters, fuel, and light as those of a second lieutenant.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 16, after the word "firemen," to strike out "$7,460" and insert "$7,920," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of 11 firemen, $7,920.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 5, after "$1,200," to insert ": Provided, That hereafter the chapel organist and choirmaster shall have the same allowances with respect to quarters, fuel, and light as those of a second lieutenant," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of chapel organist and choirmaster, $1,200: Provided, That hereafter the chapel organist and choirmaster shall have the same allowances with respect to quarters, fuel, and light as those of a second lieutenant.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 13, after the words "power plant," to strike out "$1,444" and insert "$1,440," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of 2 oilers for power plant, $1,440.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 6, after the words "officers of the," to strike out "Pay Department" and insert "Quartermaster Corps," so as to make the clause read:

All the money hereinbefore appropriated for pay of the Military Academy shall be disbursed and accounted for by officers of the Quartermaster Corps as pay of the Military Academy and for that purpose shall constitute one fund.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 23, after the word "trips," to strike out "$3,600" and insert "$3,850," so as to make the clause read:

For transportation of materials, discharged cadets, and for ferriages, for hire of camp sites for cadets on practice marches, for transportation of first class of cadets to and from Gettysburg battle field, for transportation of first and second class cadets to and from Watervliet Arsenal and Sandy Hook Proving Ground, or other ordnance establishment; and for expenses of officers detailed to accompany cadets on these trips, $3,850.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, line 2, after the word "models," to insert "books of reference, scientific periodicals, and stationery," so as to read:

For department of practical military engineering: For models, books of reference, scientific periodicals, and stationery; for purchase and repair of instruments, materials, and apparatus for use in instructing cadets in surveying, reconnoissance, signaling, and field telegraphy, military field engineering, and field fortification.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Miscellaneous items and incidental expenses," on page 21, line 22, after the word "lamps," to strike out the semicolon and insert "and"; in the same line, after the word "supplies," to insert "and"; and in line 23, after the words "gas plant," to strike out "for lighting the academy building, chapel, library, cadet barracks, mess hall, shops, hospital, offices, stables, and riding hall, sidewalks, camp, and wharfs," so as to make the clause read:

For gas-coal, oil, candles, lanterns, matches, chimneys, and wicking, and electric lamps and supplies; and for operating the gas plant, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, line 21, after the words "cadets' barracks," to strike out "$2,850" and insert "$2,850.25," so as to make the clause read:

For supplying light and plain furniture to cadets' barracks, $2,850.25.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Buildings and grounds," on page 24, after line 13, to insert:

For installation of steam heat and electric lights in ordnance barracks, and electric lights in storehouses at ordnance laboratory, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, line 7, after the word "building," to strike out "$2,000" and insert "$3,000," so as to make the clause read:

For repairs to cadet mess building, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

For waterworks: For the maintenance and operation of the filter beds, reservoirs, and pipe lines, including the tools, implements, and materials required therefor; and for policing the grounds and repairing the roads in the vicinity of the reservoirs, filters, and intake dam, and for the enforcement of rules and regulations for the protection from contamination of the water supply, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, after line 22, to insert:

For the repair, improvement, and maintenance of the cadet polo field, and for the purchase of blackboards, gongs, and other necessary material for the same, $800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

GRADING AND INSPECTION OF GRAIN.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 120) to provide for the inspection and grading of grain entering into interstate commerce, and to secure uniformity in standards and classification of grain, and for other purposes.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I shall make no objection to that motion at all. I only desire to say to the Senator from North Dakota that I am not ready to go on with the debate this afternoon.

Mr. McCUMBER. There will be no trouble about the time for debate in the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WARREN in the chair). The Senator from North Dakota moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from North Dakota to consent to now lay the bill aside so that we may take up the calendar.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not wish to be put again in the position, by the Senate taking up the calendar or taking up some particular bill and then adjourning without that bill being passed upon, of having the Chair rule that my bill has lost its place, as was the ruling the other day. That, I fear, is what would be likely to occur. What I would like, if the Senate will agree, is to fix a time, any time in the future, when we can take up this bill and vote upon it.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I can not agree now to fix a time to vote on the bill, because there are several Senators who want to speak upon it, and my experience, as well as the experience of other Senators, has been that after we have agreed on a day to vote it is difficult to get Senators to attend the debates. There has been no debate on this bill except by the Senator from North Dakota, who called it up on three or four occasions and discussed it. I have no objection to having the bill laid aside temporarily. I simply want an opportunity to debate it. At this time, as I have said, I can not agree to fix any date, but I am willing to agree to a vote after there has been a fair debate. I never had any other idea in my mind than to agree to have the vote taken at some day in the future, after we have had a reasonable opportunity to discuss the measure.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I will not object to having the unfinished business temporarily laid aside, and I suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that if he will request that it be temporarily laid aside I will ask unanimous consent to take up the calendar under Rule VIII, beginning with Order of Business 178, and if unanimous consent is granted the unfinished business will not be displaced.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if I were certain that that would be the holding of whoever might happen to occupy the chair when the question came up, I would consent; but let me make another suggestion for unanimous consent, which is that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, to be taken up again at 2 o'clock Monday as the unfinished business.

Mr. SMOOT. That could not be agreed to, because of the fact that there might be another bill brought before the Senate, and we could not set aside the rules of the Senate beforehand.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the opinion of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair would like to say that Senate bill 120 is now properly before the Senate as the unfinished business. If unanimous consent is asked and granted to temporarily lay the unfinished business aside, it will not, in the opinion of the Chair, in any way prejudice its position, but to couple with it an agreement as to the consideration of other matters would, of course, complicate the situation. The Chair believes—and the Chair thinks he is in entire accord with the prior ruling—that where the unfinished business is, by unanimous consent, temporarily laid aside, it is still the unfinished business and will come up in the regular way.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to know, in the event that the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside, what effect it will have on the other notices which have been given? I have a notice on the calendar for the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 10) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, fixing the time for the convening of Congress and commencement of the terms of President, Vice President, Senators, and Representatives. According to the notice, that joint resolution should follow the consideration of the bill of the Senator from North Dakota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair wishes to say that a notice that a Senator will move to do something binds nobody.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It has been recognized in the case of the Senator from North Dakota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair begs pardon. The Senator from North Dakota has moved in the regular way to take up his measure, and the Senate has voted to take it up, so that it is now before the Senate. Let the Chair say at this juncture that, according to the practice for many years, a notice simply has the effect of a Senator saying that, if the Senate is willing and agreeable, he will do so-and-so at a certain time; but until a motion is made and the Senate has voted upon it, to bring a matter up, it does not have preference because of a notice given in regard to it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I presume, however, that at that time, if the Senator got the floor, he would have a right to make the motion as to which he had given notice?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; undoubtedly, provided it was in order.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is what I propose to do.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator from North Dakota, which, I think, will very easily obviate the difficulty which he apprehends might arise. If the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside, and we could have a unanimous-consent agreement to proceed with bills on the calendar under Rule VIII as prior to 1 o'clock, it would make everything absolutely dependent on unanimous consent, and no motion could then be made to take up another bill.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me for a moment, I suggest that the Senator from North Dakota ask that the unfinished business be laid aside and that the Senate consider bills on the calendar, only unobjected cases to be taken up.

Mr. SMOOT. That would be better.

Mr. BRISTOW. Then there will not be any bill running over when the Senate adjourns, and the bill of the Senator from North Dakota would not suffer.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think that we have gone over this subject so often that the Senate, at least, has arrived at the conclusion that all I am desiring in this case is to have a fair hearing—to have the measure before the Senate and disposed of without any undue delay, and yet without losing its position. I am prepared to consent to the proposition, as indicated by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], but before I do so, I wish, Mr. President, to suggest another amendment to the bill, which I ask may be printed as a proposed amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is now in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. On page 3, line 12, after the word "commerce," I move to insert "and employ the inspectors now employed in grain inspection at such terminals."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator submit the amendment for action now, or does he desire it to lie on the table as pending?

Mr. McCUMBER. No, Mr. President; I do not want to ask the Senate to pass upon it now, although, if there is no Senator who objects to that course, I should be just as glad to have the amendment adopted.

Mr. NELSON. As I understand, the Senator simply wants his amendment printed.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is all I care for.

Mr. NELSON. I have no objection to that, if no further action is taken on it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 12, after the word "commerce," it is proposed to insert "and employ the inspectors now employed in grain inspection at such terminals."

Mr. NELSON. The Senator desires that considered as a pending amendment?

Mr. McCUMBER. As a proposed amendment. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator from Virginia will ask unanimous consent——

Mr. SMOOT (to Mr. McCUMBER). Ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, Mr. President, I now ask the Senator from Virginia if he will propose his unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. SWANSON. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed with the calendar, commencing with Order of Business No. 178, where we left off when the calendar was previously called, and that only unobjected cases be considered.

Mr. McCUMBER. Now, Mr. President, I wish to ask if, when we get through with the bills on the calendar, at any time before adjournment, under a unanimous-consent agreement of that kind, the unfinished business, being Calendar No. 181, would be displaced?

Mr. OVERMAN. I suggest to the Senator the way to accomplish the desired end would be to lay aside the unfinished business until 5 o'clock this afternoon, so that in the meantime unobjected cases on the calendar may be taken up. Then the Senator's bill automatically will come up at 5 o'clock, and it will be the unfinished business when adjournment comes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair wishes to say that the understanding of the Chair is that the bill of the Senator from North Dakota has been taken up, and the proposal is that it be temporarily laid aside and that unobjected cases on the calendar, commencing at No. 178, be considered. The Chair is of the opinion that an objection at any point can be raised by the Senator from North Dakota. The Chair will say that if a motion could be made and carried to take up another measure it might displace the unfinished business; but such a motion as that could not be entertained under the agreement proposed by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. McCUMBER. With that understanding, I have no objection to the unanimous consent requested by the Senator from Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The first bill on the calendar will be stated.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The bill (S. 4353) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, was announced as first in order and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pension the following-named persons at the rates stated:

Mary E. Lock, widow of Albert H. Lock, late of Troop D, Seventh Regiment United States Cavalry, War with Spain, $12 per month, and $2 per month additional on account of each of the minor children of said Albert H. Lock until they reach the age of 16 years.

William H. Ryley, late first lieutenant Company D, Third Regiment Connecticut Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, $20 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Commodore P. White, late of Company C, Ninth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, $12 per month.

Alexander Cowan, late of Capt. Lyman L. Stevens's company, Col. George A. Smith's regiment of cavalry, Nauvoo Legion, Utah Volunteers, Utah Indian disturbances, $20 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Catherine Healey, dependent mother of Martin Healey, late of Company G, Thirty-fourth Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, $12 per month.

Arthur W. S. Maw, late of Company E, Fourteenth Regiment United States Cavalry; Company I, Twenty-seventh Regiment United States Infantry; and Hospital Corps, United States Army, $20 per month.

Walter F. Davidson, late of Troop H, Second Regiment United States Cavalry, $16 per month.

Harriet N. Lair, widow of John G. Lair, late captain Company H, Fourth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, War with Mexico, $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

Ira W. Arnold, late of Company L, First Regiment Rhode Island Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, $12 per month.

Gertrude Smith, widow of George C. Smith, late of Company G, Thirty-fifth Regiment United States Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, $12 per month, and $2 per month additional on account of each of the minor children of the said George C. Smith until they reach the age of 16 years.

Emil Ginther, late of Battery A, First Battalion Maine Volunteer Heavy Artillery, War with Spain, $10 per month.

Malinda Ann Miller, widow of David R. Miller, late of Capt. Adam Shower's company, Maryland Militia, War of 1812, $24 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SMOOT subsequently said: Mr. President, the Senate has just passed Senate bill 4353. I move that the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed be reconsidered for the purpose of striking out, on page 2, lines 1, 2, 3, and 4, inclusive, covering the case of William H. Ryley, that soldier having died.

Mr. SWANSON. Let it go to conference.

Mr. SMOOT. The conferees may not know the fact which I state, and we may just as well correct it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah, that the vote by which the bill named by him was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed be reconsidered.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, it is proposed to strike out lines 1 to 4, inclusive, as follows:

The name of William H. Ryley, late first lieutenant, Company D, Third Regiment Connecticut Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (H. R. 10138) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, on page 1, after line 9, to strike out:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Emsey O. Young, widow of David Young, late of Company D, Second Regiment Iowa Volunteer Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving: Provided, That in the event of the death of William M. Young, helpless and dependent child of said Emsey O. Young, the additional pension herein granted shall cease and determine: And provided further, That in the event of the death of Emsey O. Young the name of the said William M. Young shall be placed on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, at the rate of $12 per month from and after the date of death of said Emsey O. Young.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I move to strike out lines 22, 23, 24, and 25, on page 2.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, after line 21, it is proposed to strike out:

The name of Emma Gilbert, widow of Louis A. Gilbert, late of Company K, Second Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, it appears from the report of the committee that Emma Gilbert is 57 years of age, and that she married the soldier on January 3, 1891. As to her condition, all that is stated is:

Claimant is 57 years of age and poor and in bad health and without any means of support other than her labor, which she is in a manner unable to do.

It has been stated so many times that it is hardly necessary to repeat it that if this soldier's death was due to his service it would not be necessary to resort to a special bill to get the name of his widow on the pension list. The bill as to this name is in direct conflict with the law upon the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I move to strike out the first four lines on page 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the top of page 3 it is proposed to strike out:

The name of Emma Steele, widow of John Henry Steele, late of Company A, Twenty-fifth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. BRYAN. John Henry Steele was a private who served in the Civil War from September 20, 1864, to June 7, 1865. Emma Steele was married to the claimant in 1870. The report upon that marriage relation is as follows:

Claimant filed a claim for pension under the act of April 19, 1908, which was rejected May 27, 1910, on the ground of no title under said act, the soldier having a living undivorced wife at the date of his marriage to claimant.

Further down, the report says that in 1892, in order to cure that informality in regard to the marriage, another ceremony was performed. So this is certainly another case of a widow not married within the time limit required by the statute.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in justification of the action of the committee I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the facts in this case. The report says:

Claimant filed a claim for pension under the act of April 19, 1908, which was rejected May 27, 1910, on the ground of no title under said act, the soldier having a living undivorced wife at the date of his marriage to claimant. It appears from the evidence in the case that soldier first married one Rosalia Carlisle in March, 1860, whom he left with her parents when he enlisted in the Army, and when he returned home in June, 1865, his wife had gone away with another man. In the year 1869, in the month of April, he, without divorce from Rosalia, married one Eliza, from whom he separated in September, 1869, and Eliza obtained a divorce from him February 9, 1870. On March 29, 1870, soldier married claimant, Emma. Both marriages were void as to the first wife. Early in 1892 he received information that Rosalia was still alive and had never been divorced from him, and he went into court and obtained a divorce from her, the decree being dated February 12, 1892, more than a year and a half after the passage of the act of June 27, 1890.

I wish to say that, technically speaking, the Senator is right; that the soldier had no legal marriage to this woman until after June 27, 1890. The majority of the committee, however, took into consideration the fact that he had lived with this woman since 1870, only five years after the close of the war; she lived with him as long as the soldier lived; and under those circumstances the committee thought they were justified in giving this widow a pension. That is all there is in the case.

Mr. BRYAN. All I have to say in regard to that statement is that, it seems to me, if anybody would have known whether or not this soldier was divorced he would be expected to know it. He knew perfectly well that he had not gotten a divorce, and he knew perfectly well that his wife had not obtained one against him.

The strongest argument that I have seen in favor of allowing the claim of this widow is not mentioned by the Senator from Utah. In the peroration of the report it is stated that this third wife of the soldier lived for a long time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 5, after the name "John," to strike out "Heming" and insert "Hennings," so as to make the clause read:

The name of John Hennings, late of Company A, Thirty-ninth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 13, after the word "late," to strike out the word "of" and insert "captain," and, in line 14, before the word "Ninety-seventh," to insert "and major," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Mary Fields, widow of John Fields, late captain Company G, and major Ninety-seventh Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $35 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 25, before the word "widow," to insert "former," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Nancy E. Tate, former widow of John W. Tate, late of Company C, Ninth Regiment Missouri State Militia Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I move to strike out lines 25 and 26 on page 3 and lines 1 and 2 on page 4.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, after line 24, it is proposed to strike out:

The name of Nancy E. Tate, widow of John W. Tate, late of Company C, Ninth Regiment Missouri State Militia Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the report, on page 8, recites as follows:

Claimant * * * married soldier January 18, 1857, and he died November 4, 1887. Claimant remarried November 18, 1894, John H. Henthel and divorced him on her own application December 24, 1901, at which date she surrendered her pension of $8 per month under the act of June 27, 1890, which she had been receiving from July 9, 1890, until she remarried.

Claimant applied May 1, 1889, for a widow's pension under the general law, which was rejected on the ground that soldier's death was not due to his military service. She applied November 26, 1902, for a renewal of pension under the act of March 3, 1901, and her claim was rejected January 24, 1903, on the ground that she had no title under said act, she having not been pensioned on account of soldier's death from disability incurred in the military service.

From this it would appear that the claimant was the widow of a pensioner. Afterwards, on the 18th day of November, 1894, she remarried. She obtained a divorce on December 24, 1901, and on November 26, 1902, attempted to secure a widow's pension under the general law. Her application was rejected. She now comes in and asks for a pension as the former widow of John W. Tate. Certainly that does not present, on the face of it, at least, even an equitable claim for a special pension.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, on page 4, after line 2, to strike out:

The name of Mary E. Dager, former widow of John Farley, late of Company E, One hundred and forty-second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 18, to strike out:

The name of David S. Knapp, late musician, Second Regiment Maine Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 9, before the name "Hatfield," to strike out the initial "M" and insert the initial "A," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Cyrena A. Hatfield, widow of John M. Hatfield, late of Company K, Seventh Regiment Missouri State Militia Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I move to strike out lines 5, 6, 7, and 8 on page 6.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, after line 4, it is proposed to strike out:

The name of Hattie E. Wallace, widow of William E. Wallace, late of Company G, Twentieth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. THOMAS. The report states, on this point:

Hattie E. Wallace, aged 57 years, is the widow of William E. Wallace, who served as a private in Company G, Twentieth Regiment Kentucky Infantry, from September 8, 1863, to November 12, 1865. Served two years two months and four days. Soldier was formerly pensioned at $2 for rheumatism of left foot under the general law. He was later pensioned under the act of June 27, 1890, at $12 for rheumatism and resulting disease of heart and senile debility. He was pensioned at $24 per month from June 6, 1906, under special act of Congress. He died March 13, 1909.

Claimant's post-office address is 218 Market Circle, Chicago, Ill. She was married to soldier August 23, 1893, and lived with him until his death.

This marriage was more than three years subsequently to the time required by the statute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 18, before the word "widow," to insert "former," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Deborah R. Isherwood, former widow of Joseph F. Isherwood, late of Company C, Thirty-seventh Regiment New Jersey Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, on page 7 I move to strike out lines 7, 8, 9, and 10. The proposed beneficiary is deceased.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, after line 6, it is proposed to strike out:

The name of Sarah E. Couch, helpless and dependent child of Samuel Couch, late of Company A, One hundred and thirty-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, on page 8, line 5, before the words "per month," to strike out "$30" and insert "$40," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Frank J. Stupp, late of Company G, One hundred and eleventh Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I move to strike out lines 3 to 6, on page 9.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, after line 2, it is proposed to strike out:

The name of Mary E. Cornish, widow of Chauncy W. Cornish, late of Company K, One hundred and forty-ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. BRYAN. According to the report of the committee, Mary E. Cornish is the widow of a soldier who served from August 16 to November 20, 1862, a service of about 94 days. She married this soldier December 25, 1890, after the date authorized by the statute.

Mr. KERN. How long after the date?

Mr. SHIVELY. Thirty or 60 days.

Mr. BRYAN. It is a little more than 30 days—from June 27 to December 25—according to my method of calculation. This soldier of 94 days' service, who had no shadow of injury in the Army, deserted his wife, and in addition to that there is no claim in the report to justify placing her name on the pension roll. There is no claim made that she is even in poor health, that being the usual claim. It is simply the claim of a woman who married a man who had 94 days of nominal service in the Army, she having married him after the time when the acts of Congress will recognize even her equitable claim to be considered.

Three or four years ago these claims of widows were stricken out as a matter of course. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] said he understood that had been the rule, and he had advised those who asked him to that effect. A year ago quite a number of items were stricken from the bill for the same identical reason, and it is the general understanding that they have no place here. They have no place in the bill under the rules of the committee or under the acts of Congress.

It may be claimed that this marriage having occurred about the time the statute went into effect we ought to allow the claim to stand; but it must be remembered that the claim by which this widow seeks to get on the rolls is purely technical. Her deceased husband, as it seems, could have been neither a very good soldier nor a very good husband. He had only a technical service.

If we recognize this class of claims, I do not know any reason why any woman who has been so fortunate or so unfortunate as to become a widow and live to be 60 years old should not be supported at the public expense.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will call the attention of the chairman of the committee to a change in the name which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, line 3, it is proposed to strike out "Chauncy" and insert "Chaney."

Mr. SHIVELY. No; on page 9, line 4, I move to strike out out "Chauncy" and substitute in lieu thereof "Chancy."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will be instructed to change the spelling in accordance with the request.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I move to strike out lines 18, 19, 20, and 21, on page 9.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, after line 17, it is proposed to strike out:

The name of Emma S. Bartlett, widow of John E. Bartlett, late of Company F, Thirty-first Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. THOMAS. I read from page 23 of the report:

Applicant was pensioned at $12 on account that soldier's death was due to his Army service. Her name was dropped from the pension rolls on account of violation of the act of August 7, 1882.

* * * * * * *

Some three or four witnesses testify that they have known claimant for many years and have investigated the charges that were brought against her, causing her name to be dropped from the pension rolls, and that they firmly believe that the charges were untrue and the result of malice. The witnesses further state that they have closely observed the conduct of applicant and found her to be a discreet and morally behaved woman. The testimony further shows that she is now almost helpless and in destitute circumstances—

And so forth.

Here is a case where the applicant has had a pension under the general laws, but because of her violation of those laws the pension ceased. In view of the fact, however, that outside witnesses come and testify that they think the charge made against her was untrue—and that charge certainly was investigated, because the Pension Bureau never acts in an ex parte manner—she is to be restored to the pension rolls as though there had been no violation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, on page 9, after line 6, to strike out:

The name of Garret A. Hessalink, late of Company C, Sixty-eighth Regiment New York National Guard Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 25, after the words "rate of," to strike out "$24" and insert "$20," so as to read:

The name of Susanna Barclay, widow of Charles S. Barclay, late of Company H, One hundred and second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 12, before the word "widow," to insert "former," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Sarah P. Tranmer, former widow of William B. Tranmer, late ordinary seaman, U. S. S. Great Western and Benton, United States Navy, and Company C, One hundred and twelfth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, after line 12, to strike out:

The name of Sarah L. Gillis, widow of William Irving Gillis, late of Company B, Sixth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 18, after the word "late," to strike out "lieutenant colonel" and insert "major and assistant adjutant general," and, in line 19, after the word

"Volunteers," to strike out "Seventeenth Army Corps," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Lucy A. Cadle, widow of Cornelius Cadle, late major and assistant adjutant general, United States Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, after line 4, to strike out:

The name of Lucy A. Wharton, widow of Junius E. Wharton, late of Company D, Second Regiment Iowa Volunteer Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, after line 12, to strike out:

The name of Ella M. Decker, widow of James L. Decker, late of Company H, Eighth Regiment United States Colored Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 5, after the name "Melvina," to strike out "Battles" and insert "Bottles," and in line 6, before the word "late," to strike out the name "Battles" and insert "Bottles," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Melvina Bottles, widow of William J. Bottles, late of Company E, Twenty-first Regiment New Jersey Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 17, before the words "per month," to strike out "$20" and insert "$12," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Julia C. Barstow, widow of Isaac C. Barstow, late of Company M, Eleventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 21, after the words "per month," to strike out "in lieu of that she is now receiving," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Martha Fitzpatrick, former widow of Benjamin Murphy, late of Company F, Ninety-third Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 14, before the words "per month," to strike out "$30" and insert "$24," so as to make the clause read:

The name of George R. Moore, late of Company G, One hundred and thirty-ninth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, after line 14, to strike out:

The name of Marie E. Tilton, widow of George H. Tilton, late surgeon's steward, United States ship Mahaska, United States Navy, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I move to strike out lines 7 to 10, inclusive, on page 17.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 17, after line 6, it is proposed to strike out:

The name of Henry M. Rulon, late unassigned, Thirteenth Regiment United States Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, this gentleman served 25 days in the Civil War. He was discharged from the military service on a certificate of disability. He was pensioned under the general law at the rate of $8 per month. I think the report shows why this item was included in the bill. This is a House bill, and in the next to the concluding paragraph it is said:

He owns a little home in Monmouth, Ill., where he lives, and there has been a special assessment against the property amounting to $237, and he has no means for meeting it.

I suppose we will provide the means by a special pension bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the noes seem to have it.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I thought the ayes had it. I should like to have the question put again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will again state the question. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida. [Putting the question.] The Chair is still of the opinion that the noes have it. The noes have it, and the amendment is rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, on page 17, line 12, after the word "Colored" to insert "Volunteer," so as to make the clause read:

The name of John H. Hector, late of Company G, Eleventh Regiment United States Colored Volunteer Heavy Artillery, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, line 15, before the word "widow" to insert "former," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Anna M. Lunn, former widow of William H. Lunn, late of Company H, Sixty-fifth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, after line 6, to strike out:

The name of John Brown, late of Company I, Thirteenth Regiment Maryland Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, line 25, before the words "per month" to strike out "$30" and insert "$24," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Robert Kiers, late first-class boy, United States Navy, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, on page 19, I move to strike out lines 1 to 4.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the top of page 19, it is proposed to strike out:

The name of Rebecca S. Merritt, widow of Josiah Merritt, late of Company H, One hundred and ninety-third Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, encouraged by the success we have had so far on this bill, I should like to hear some member of the committee get up and defend this item. I will read what the report says on the subject.

Mr. THOMPSON. To what page of the report does the Senator refer?

Rebecca S. Merritt is the widow of Josiah Merritt. He saw what was coming and enlisted March 3, 1865, and served, when there was no war, for five months and incurred no injury. Perhaps he never even heard a gun fired. He was able to marry on January 29, 1893, three years after the law says we can not recognize marriage. Now, I want to know if the "noes" will have it on this vote. [Reading:]

Five neighbors testify that they have known applicant from 5 to 15 years, and that she is now almost helpless from nervous breakdown brought on by nursing and caring for her late husband during the last two years of his life. They further testify that she is an upright, moral, Christian woman.

That is the basis for it, Mr. President. I should like to know what argument can be made in favor of putting that name on the pension rolls. Her husband never enlisted until all danger was over, and she never married him until three years after the law says she would not be entitled to a pension.

I understood the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] to say the other day that the Amy case had no place in the bill, but to-day we have repeated and added claims of that identical class in this bill, and we have allowed them to stay there. I want to apologize to Louise Amy for the injustice I did her yesterday, and I hope somebody will put her name back in the bill in conference if this kind of thing is to proceed much further.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Florida that I believe, from what I know now and from the testimony that is given here, that this is a case similar to the Amy case, and I shall vote to have it stricken from the bill.

Mr. BRYAN. If the Senator from Utah can not make any defense of it, then there is none.

Mr. SHIVELY. Of course, if this woman had married the soldier three years before, she would be entitled to a pension under the general law. Constantly recurring to the fact that the applicant is not entitled to a pension under the general law proves nothing. The soldier had between five and six months' service. It is true that it appears he went into the service in March, 1865. How strenuous that service was I do not know; but that there was plenty of good, hard, strong fighting after March, 1865, everybody knows.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator if there is anything in the record to show that the soldier actually got to the front at all?

Mr. SHIVELY. The Senator need not assume that he did not get to the front.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not assuming that he did not. I am just asking if he did.

Mr. SHIVELY. I have not all the evidence before me, or I would be delighted to exhibit it to the Senator; but I do not think there is any occasion to assume that the soldier did not get to the front.

Mr. BRYAN. It seems to me the burden of proof is on those who are trying to show that this special pension should be granted. Of this much we are sure, that he never got hurt in the war.

Mr. SHIVELY. There is nothing even in the general law about being at the front.

Mr. BRYAN. The general law is bad enough, but it is not as bad as these special bills.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, if there is any reason why this widow should have a pension, that same reason will apply undoubtedly to a great many other cases. It certainly seems to me wrong to have a law in the way of hundreds of widows applying for pensions and then to make exceptions in favor of a few who are able to reach a Senator or a Representative or to get before a committee. It seems to me that if you are going to allow pensions to widows who were married 30 years after the war closed, or nearly that long, the rule should be made general, and we should not retain the rule and bar hundreds who may be just as deserving as the others and then except a few who can get the ear of Representatives or Senators or committees.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to say that the Senator from Nebraska has expressed in a nutshell the objection to the entire method of special legislation on this subject. The Good Book says that many are called but few are chosen. Here many are called but many are chosen.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have a strong sympathy for the widow of a soldier who married before the war. I can have a strong sympathy for the widow of a soldier even when the marriage occurred soon thereafter. I can imagine that in either of those cases the widow might have some legitimate claim upon the Government for a pension. But here, when the war closed in 1865 and the survivor of the war married in 1893, it seems to me we have a case in which the widow can have very small claim upon the Government.

Congress evidently intended when it enacted the law to draw an arbitrary line and to give public notice to women who married ex-soldiers after that date that they should not be considered as having any claim. The law has been in effect for many years, and it has barred probably tens of thousands of cases. If the bar is to be removed, let us remove it as to everyone.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, the Senator's quarrel is really with the system of private pension bills. We have several hundred thousand names carried on the pension rolls of the Government. Of course the great body of those were admitted to the rolls under the general law.

Under the general law an attempt is made to grade pensions with a view to approaching equity as nearly as possible, but there are still grades. I presume that among the hundreds of thousands there are no two cases that are precisely alike to a nicety. There will be extremes within each grade. There will frequently occur cases where by reason of inability to perfect the legal proof special relief is necessary. There will in another instance be within a given grade a case where the circumstances are exceptional. The helplessness, the indigence, and all the things that go to make up a pension case may be present in a strong degree. That will make another exception. All these cases are exceptional.

The special pension, therefore, attempts to take the few cases that do not fall within the general rules of our pension legislation. The special circumstances are taken into consideration. In this case the soldier had a service of a certain length of time. Had this woman married him three years before, she would be admitted to the roll under the general pension law.

There is something in the fact that the woman married and lived with the soldier and nursed him and took care of him through his old age and up to the time of his death. This is one of the circumstances of the case in favor of the granting of a pension to this widow.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Of course the Senator realizes that there are thousands of such cases.

Mr. SHIVELY. I do not think so, where they are accompanied by the same circumstances.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What were the circumstances that made this case exceptional?

Mr. SHIVELY. The Senator can read the report. He has it before him, I apprehend.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understand the case was simply that the veteran was a poor man living on a pension and his widow is in indigent circumstances. There are thousands of cases like that, but Congress has barred them.

Mr. SHIVELY. There may be a number of cases like that. It has been the whole history of this system that when extreme cases are brought to the attention of the committee they grant relief. We may either do that or you may pass a general law, but in that way probably many cases where there would not be the same degree of relief required would come under that general law. It is a little like the old principle of equity, where because of the universality of the law the law could not meet all cases, and here are cases which we attempt to meet by special legislation.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, the report does not show the age of this widow. All it says is that she is suffering from nervous breakdown at this time, in 1914, from nursing her husband in 1903. Some good-natured neighbors say that. What are the peculiar circumstances that distinguish this case and make it stand aside from the many thousands of cases?

Mr. President, I am not commissioned to speak for the soldiers of the Civil War in the Union Army, but it does occur to me that the pension laws of this country instead of being used for their benefit are being used for the benefit of people who were never in battle, for the benefit of people who, young and active and strong, married ex-soldiers 25 or 30 years after the war was over. It is a pitiable spectacle to me to observe on the pension rolls to-day that the noncombatants outnumber those who were enlisted in the Civil War.

I am surprised that any Senator can defend this case. It is nothing but an old-age pension. It is not even that, because the age of this claimant is not stated.

We may smile at pension bills for the home guards and bills designed to pension everybody 60 years old, but, Mr. President, such a bill was introduced in Congress a year or two ago and it has behind it the indorsement of the American Federation of Labor. If we can not resist the appeals of half a million people, how are we going to resist the stronger appeals of a million and a half?

On the merits I say this claim ought to be stricken from the bill in justice to the laws we have enacted and in justice to the meritorious names on the pension list.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida to strike out the clause.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, at the top of page 20, to strike out the following clause:

> The name of Edward Riley, late of Company D, Fifty-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, after line 3, to strike out:

> The name of Royal Colvin, late unassigned, Thirteenth Regiment New York Volunteer Heavy Artillery, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading was continued to line 15, on page 20.

Mr. BRYAN. On page 20, I move to strike out lines 12 to 15.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 20, strike out lines 12 to 15, inclusive, in the following words:

> The name of Sarah E. Hibben, former widow of Joseph O. Woodworth, late of Company E, Forty-seventh Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. BRYAN. Sarah E. Hibben, according to the report, was formerly the widow of a soldier, and then afterwards, in 1870, she married William Hibben, who died about 1887, and has not since remarried. Mr. Hibben, according to this report, was a deserter.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. What page is it on?

Mr. BRYAN. On page 51. He served from September 4, 1862, to January 28, 1863, and then deserted. He could not get on the pension rolls, and here is his widow an applicant for the place. They have gone to the bureau, and the bureau has turned them down on the ground that Congress will not pension deserters from the Army; and they come along and have some friendly Congressman introduce a bill, and here it appears, to pay a pension to the wife of a deserter. Here it appears in the report——

Mr. SMOOT rose.

Mr. BRYAN. I know the Senator from Utah will not undertake to say that it ought to be there. It simply demonstrates that no member of the committee can keep up with all these cases. That is an impossibility when an omnibus pension bill is filed here once or twice a week, with reports covering 100 printed pages. Certainly this item ought not to remain in the bill.

Mr. SHIVELY. The Senator from Florida is mistaken. The applicant is not applying on the ground that the soldier deserted. That is not the claim of the widow.

Mr. BRYAN. That is the only way she can apply. She is not the widow of a soldier.

Mr. SHIVELY (reading):

After the death of second husband the claimant applied for pension as the widow of first husband, Joseph O. Woodworth, July 6, 1889, which claim was rejected, after special examination, on the ground the soldier's death was not due to his military service.

Mr. BRYAN. A widow who has not remarried can not get on the pension roll unless her husband died as a result of his service.

Mr. SHIVELY. That is true under the general law, and that is the reason why the case is here.

Mr. BRYAN. Would the Senator put the widow of a deserter on the pension roll?

Mr. SHIVELY. Certainly not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida to strike out the clause which has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, on page 20, after line 15, to strike out:

The name of Frank Unnerstall, late of Company C, Second Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, after line 23, to strike out:

The name of Thomas O'Reilly, late of Company C, Sixty-ninth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, line 20, after the name "Smith," to insert "alias Harvey Guthrie," and in line 22, before the word "Infantry," to insert "Volunteer," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Harvey Smith, alias Harvey Guthrie, late of Company F, One hundred and eighth Regiment United States Colored Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, line 5, after the word "determine," to strike out "And provided further, That in the event of the death of Eliza E. Tuttle the name of said George R. Tuttle shall be placed on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, at the rate of $12 per month from and after the date of the death of said Eliza E. Tuttle," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Eliza E. Tuttle, widow of Edmund B. Tuttle, late of Company C, Eighth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving: Provided, That in the event of the death of George R. Tuttle, helpless and dependent son of Edmund B. Tuttle, the additional pension herein granted shall cease and determine.

The amendment was agreed to:

The next amendment was, on page 24, line 1, before the word "Heavy," to insert "Volunteer," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Harriet Daniels, widow of Frank Daniels, late of Company B, Third Regiment United States Colored Volunteer Heavy Artillery, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, line 3, before the words "per month," to strike out "$40" and insert "$30," so as to make the clause read:

The name of George H. Harris, late second-class fireman, United States Navy, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, after line 3, to strike out:

The name of Charles B. Cundiff, late of Company G, One hundred and ninety-eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, line 10, before the words "per month," to strike out "$30" and insert "$24," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Thomas W. Dare, late of Company D, One hundred and thirty-sixth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, line 18, before the words "per month," to strike out "$50" and insert "$40," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Jeremiah Van Riper, late of Twenty-eighth Independent Battery, New York Volunteer Light Artillery, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, after line 19, to strike out—

The name of Secundina Guelachowski, widow of Alexander Guelachowski, late chaplain Second Regiment New Mexico Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, after line 23, to strike out—

The name of Pascualita J. Garcia de Anaya, widow of Juan Garcia Y. Anaya, late of Company G, Third Regiment New Mexico Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 8, before the word "late," to strike out the name "Pettis" and insert the name "Pettit," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Henry E. Pettit, late of Company C, Sixth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 15, before the words "per month," to strike out "$50" and insert "$40," so as to make the clause read:

The name of William A. Dobbins, late of Company B, One hundred and twenty-fourth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 21, after the word "Indiana," to strike out "Volunteers" and insert Volunteer Infantry," so as to make the clause read:

The name of William Roberts, late of Company F, Seventh Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $36 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 14, after the words "per month," to insert "in lieu of that he is now receiving," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Ardell D. Grigsby, helpless and dependent child of Philip Grigsby, late of Company C, Seventh Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 20, after the word "unassigned," to insert "Minnesota Volunteers," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Susan Doolittle, widow of John Doolittle, late unassigned, Minnesota Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, line 3, before the words "per month," to strike out "$50" and insert "$40," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Aaron Walker, late of Company A, Eighty-seventh Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHILTON. I was busy for the moment, and the Secretary read very rapidly. I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the amendment striking out lines 4 to 7, on page 25, the pension to Charles B. Cundiff. I ask that that amendment be disagreed to.

Mr. SHIVELY. What is the number of the bill and the page of the report?

Mr. CHILTON. It is H. R. No. 8042, on page 62.

The soldier was refused a pension twice, on the ground that he had not been in the service for 90 days, as required by the act of 1912, and also upon the ground that he did not contract rheumatism in the service for which he applied. The fact remains, however, that he was in the service. There is nothing against his record, and he is now suffering, as the evidence shows, from heart trouble, skin disease, disease of the nervous system, and almost total blindness. Such cases have passed, and it does seems to me the Senate ought to put that soldier upon the pension list. It comes within the rule, clearly.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that this soldier did not enlist until April 5, 1865, three days before the last battle of the war.

Mr. CHILTON. But he did enlist.

Mr. SMOOT. And he served until May 8, 1865.

Mr. CHILTON. He served until the war was over. He served as long as he could.

Mr. BRYAN. He served as long as he could after he got in.

Mr. CHILTON. We have passed such cases dozens and dozens of times in the Senate. The length of service has nothing to do with it. The question now is, Is he disabled, is he totally blind, or anything of that kind?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CHILTON. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say that there have been very few cases where the terms have been three or four or half a dozen days less than 90 days. I do not believe the Senator can point to a single case where the service of 30 or 35 days has ever been the basis for a pension by Congress.

Mr. BRYAN. I can help the Senator out. I can point to one case this afternoon where the man served only 25 days.

Mr. SMOOT. In Cuba or the Philippine Islands?

Mr. BRYAN. No; in the Civil War.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I should like to inquire how old this man is?

Mr. CHILTON. He is 71 years old.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. In God's name let him have it. He will live only a few years, anyhow.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, the degree in which it violates the law, so to speak, has nothing to do with it. The fact remains that here is a man who was a good soldier. He enlisted in the Army; he served until the war was over and was mustered out of the service; and he is now old, decrepit, blind, and helpless. If you come below the 90 days' limit by 1 day, who shall say that we shall not come below it for 20 days or 60 days? No fault can be ascribed to the soldier. He was a good soldier and he is entitled to this pension if some of the others are.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to correct the impression, at least, that may have been made on the Senate by the statement of the Senator from Florida. The soldier referred to by him, who served only 24 days, was wounded in the service. Of course there is considerable difference between that case and the one before us.

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator, in making the correction, has made a mistake. He was not wounded; he got sick.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the law he is entitled to a pension.

Mr. BRYAN. He was not wounded by a bullet.

Mr. SMOOT. It must have been proven that he contracted the disease he had in the line of duty.

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator will find it described on page 43.

Mr. SHIVELY. He was discharged on account of disability incurred in the service. That accounts for his short service.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, of course the appeal made by the Senator from West Virginia for the four days during which this valiant soldier served appeals to me.

Mr. CHILTON. Not 4 days; he served nearly 30 days.

Mr. BRYAN. He says he served three days before the surrender at Appomattox—three full days. I mean that he enlisted. He was never in the war. Just think of the excitement and stress and strain he was under.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

Mr. BRYAN. Besides all that, Mr. President, he deserves credit——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. BRYAN. In a moment. He deserves credit, Mr. President, because, as the Senator says, he was a good soldier. After he enlisted, after he made up his mind to fight, he would have been a good fighter, but he did not make up his mind until after the war was over, although during the war he was old enough to have served through the whole period.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, there is no telling how long the war would have lasted if the soldier had not enlisted when he did. It could only stand up for three or four days after he got in. There is nothing in this record to show why he had not served before. There are plenty of soldiers who are drawing pensions who enlisted only a few days before the war was over. He knew nothing about when it would end. It is not shown here that he was a mind reader or a prophet.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. CHILTON. In just one minute. He enlisted in good faith and served. Now, that is not the question before the Senate. We have not addressed ourselves to the question of service in deciding upon these pension matters. The sole point is that he is an old man now, deserving the protecting care of the Government; and upon that theory I have voted, unless it can be shown that the soldier was a deserter or had something in his record that did not recommend him to the fostering care of the Government. This is bringing up a technicality. As has been explained here by the chairman of the committee, these bills are brought in to relieve in those cases which do not come in under the general law. There is nothing against this man's record. He deserves a pension. He is 71 years old and almost blind, and suffering from a skin disease. There can be no good reason why this man should not be pensioned as well as anyone else.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, the Senator is mistaken about his being totally blind. He is merely blind in one eye.

Mr. CHILTON. The report says "almost total blindness"——

Mr. BRYAN. "Of left eye," as the Senator will see if the Senator will look at it. He is not blind. I then will base my championship of the action of the committee, and it affords me much pleasure to defend the action of the committee, upon the ground the Senator from West Virginia states, that the war lasted only three days after the soldier enlisted, but he put the country to a lot of trouble by not enlisting four years before and ending it four years earlier.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question arises on a reconsideration of the vote of the item referred to by the Senator from West Virginia. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 25, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, struck out lines 4, 5, 6, and 7, as follows:

The name of Charles B. Cundiff, late of Company G, One hundred and ninety-eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The proposition would be upon agreeing to the committee amendment, would it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment having been agreed to the motion now is on reconsideration.

Mr. CHILTON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to reconsider. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it. The noes have it.

Mr. CHILTON. I ask for a division.

Mr. BRYAN. I rise to a point of order. The Chair has announced the result of the vote. The Senator is too late.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that if the Senator doubts the announcement of the Chair he has a right to ask for a division.

Mr. SWANSON. I suggest to the Senator from West Virginia that this matter will go into conference.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the bill will go to conference.

Mr. CHILTON. I withdraw my request, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia withdraws his request. The motion to reconsider is lost.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

DOCUMENTARY HISTORY OF THE CONSTITUTION.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 104) for printing as a public document the publication of the State Department known as the Documentary History of the Constitution of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that that joint resolution be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. POMERENE. What is the calendar number of that joint resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is Order of Business No. 180.

Mr. POMERENE. I have no objection to its indefinite postponement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] to indefinitely postpone the joint resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution relative to the Committee on Banking and Currency reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Oklahoma—the Senator probably was not in the Chamber at the moment the agreement was made—that we are now proceeding under a unanimous-consent agreement, which only admits of the taking up of unobjected cases on the calendar.

Mr. OWEN. I was not aware of that.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 1986) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Henry Fuller was announced as next in order on the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over.

The bill (S. 3594) to correct the military record of Peter Duchane was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move to indefinitely postpone that bill, as there is an adverse report thereon.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I thought the calendar was being called in order. What became of Order of Business 190, being Senate bill 1986?

Mr. SMOOT. I objected to that bill, thinking it was Order of Business 181. I withdraw my objection to Order of Business 190, though I notice there is an adverse report thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Orders of Business 190, 191, and 192 have been reported adversely.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I move the indefinite postponement of these bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi moves the indefinite postponement of Order of Business 190, being Senate bill 1986——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Was that the unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I will say to the Senator that it was.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], when these bills were reported to the Senate, asked that they go on the calendar. I really do not know whether or not he desires to speak upon them. I shall leave the matter of their disposition entirely to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I did not know that my colleague had objected to their indefinite postponement. I hope the bills may retain their places on the calendar and go over under objection.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator from Michigan desires for his colleague that the bills go over, I have no objection.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I thank the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. But there was a unanimous report of the committee that they be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I would be obliged to the Senator from Mississippi if he would let the bills go over.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bills referred to, being Senate bill 1986, Senate bill 3594, and Senate bill 1990, will go over.

BYRON W. CANFIELD.

The bill (S. 1044) for the relief of Byron W. Canfield was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that in the administration of the pension laws Byron W. Canfield, late captain Company E, One hundred and fifth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, shall be held to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States on the 30th of January, 1863, but that no pension, bounty, pay, or other pecuniary emolument shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I will ask the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] what was the report of the committee in that case?

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from Iowa reported this bill. I will say that it was quite fully considered at the last Congress.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I asked the Senator from Iowa as to the nature of the report in this case.

Mr. KENYON. If the Senator from Mississippi will turn to the calendar docket, he will find that the report is a unanimous one. I will call the Senator's attention to the order of Gen. Grant in the matter.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I merely asked the Senator from Iowa to state what was the report of the committee?

Mr. KENYON. The report of the committee was unanimous. I was directed to report the bill by the committee. The bill has once before, I think, passed the Senate.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That is all I wish to know.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ERNEST C. STAHL.

The bill (S. 3488) for the relief of Ernest C. Stahl was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that in the administration of the laws relating to pensions and to the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any branch thereof, Ernest C. Stahl shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a lieutenant serving in the Colored Infantry of the United States at Alexandria, Va., on the 12th of January, 1866; but no back pay, bounty, or pension shall become due or available by virtue of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SETTLERS' CLAIMS IN SHERMAN COUNTY, OREG.

The bill (S. 1366) to adjust the claims of certain settlers in Sherman County, Oreg., was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that bill go over, Mr. President, as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY] who reported it is absent.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope the Senator from North Carolina will not ask that the bill go over.

Mr. OVERMAN. I withdraw my objection.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate $250,000 to adjust the claims of Harry Hill and other settlers, commonly known as the Sherman County settlers, on lands in Sherman and adjoining counties in Oregon, to be paid in such amounts and to such persons, their heirs or legal representatives, as are mentioned in the report made by Special Agent Thomas B. Neuhausen, of the Department of the Interior, under authority of the act of Congress approved February 26, 1904 (33 Stats., 51), as embodied in pages 22 to 35, inclusive, of House Document No. 36, Fifty-eighth Congress, third session; the amount to be paid to each settler, his heirs or legal representatives, being the value of the land settled on by each, respectively, together with the value of the improvements erected by each, respectively, where such improvements were not sold or removed by the settler, but in those cases where the settler purchased land from The Dalles Military Road Co., or its successors, the amount to be paid to the settler, his heirs or legal representatives, shall be the amount so paid by him as consideration in his purchase, and no purchaser or assignee of any of the claims shall receive therefor a greater amount than was paid to the settler for his assignment.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to ask if that is the bill which was brought up and passed in the last Congress in which former Senator Bourne and others were interested?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The bill has been before the Senate and once passed the Senate, I know.

Mr. BURTON. It is a case where the settlers entered upon lands, and it was afterwards found that the Government was unable to give them any title, that the title belonged elsewhere, is it not?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. These settlers went on the lands, took them up as homesteads, and preempted them. Many of them went there at the invitation of the Government. The lands were a part of the overlapping grant of the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. After having lived on the lands for a number of years the court decided adversely to the opinion which had been rendered by the Secretary of the Interior. After these men had improved their lands and lived on them for a number of years the courts decided against their right to take them.

Mr. BURTON. Is there any assurance that the amount appropriated here of $250,000 will cover all those claims?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It does not cover all that is claimed, of course; but the Secretary of the Interior sent special agents out there. There was a full hearing and investigation. The names of the settlers are reported, the amount and the value of the improvements which they made on the lands.

Mr. BURTON. That is estimated at $250,000?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURTON. Is that estimate conclusive on the settlers?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is conclusive on the settlers, yes. That is all they can get.

Mr. BURTON. And this will be the last of it?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think there is no question about that, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. BURTON. I remember that there was some discussion of this bill and some doubt was expressed about it when the bill was passed, as I recall it, during a preceding Congress.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BONDS OF MARSHALS, ETC.

The bill (S. 4263) to increase the maximum limit of the official bonds which may be required of United States marshals and clerks of United States district courts in certain cases was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, on page 2, line 2, after the word "thereto," to strike out "Provided, That this section shall not apply to the bonds of clerks and marshals in the District of Alaska," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of an act entitled "An act regulating fees and costs, and for other purposes," approved February 22, 1875, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That whenever the business of the courts in any judicial district shall make it necessary, in the opinion of the Attorney General, for the clerk of the district court or the marshal to furnish greater security than the official bond now required by law, a bond in a sum not to exceed $100,000 shall be given when required by the Attorney General, who shall fix the amount thereof."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ATLANTIC COAST LINE RAILROAD CO.

The bill (S. 4053) for the relief of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Co. was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to state and pay the claim, now barred by the statute of limitations, of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Co., as successor to the Savannah, Florida & Western Railway Co., arising out of underpayments for freight shipments by the War Department in 1898 from Columbia, Tenn., to Florida point, in accordance with the decision of the Court of Claims in case No. 29908 in that court; and for the purpose of this act a sum, not to exceed $400, is appropriated.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NINETEENTH INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF AMERICANISTS.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 97) authorizing the President to extend invitations to foreign Governments to participate in the International Congress of Americanists was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the President to extend invitations to foreign Governments to be represented by delegates at the Nineteenth International Congress of Americanists, to be held at the city of Washington in October of the year 1914, but no appropriation shall be granted for expenses of delegates or for other expenses incurred in connection with the conference.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not going to object to the consideration of the joint resolution, but I want it understood that, if I am a Member of the Senate and three or four years from now there should be a claim presented to Congress to reimburse certain expenses of the foreign delegates invited as guests to this congress, I shall oppose any appropriation for that purpose.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, under those circumstances I would join with the Senator from Utah.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. O'GORMAN. In view of the remarks made by the Senator from Utah, it might be pertinent for me to say that this joint resolution was reported favorably by the Committee on Foreign Relations with the distinct understanding that the Government would not incur one cent of expense in connection with it.

Mr. POMERENE. The joint resolution itself so provides.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator, I know the joint resolution so provides, and I know that what the Senator from New York has said is exactly the fact, but I also know that similar bills and joint resolutions have passed this body heretofore, containing the identical words contained in this joint resolution, but years afterwards we have been called upon for appropriations to pay the expenses incurred. I hope that will not be the case in this instance; and I simply give notice now that if it is, and I am a Member of the Senate, I will oppose any appropriation which may be sought.

Mr. POMERENE. I was advised the other day by a scientist who was interested in this matter that the money required was to be raised by private subscription among the scientists of the country and their friends.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio tell us what is the purpose of this congress?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, this congress was organized probably 25 or 30 years ago by scientists because of the intense interest which grew out of Humboldt's discoveries in South America. They study especially the subject of archeology, anthropology, and other kindred scientific subjects. In at least 18 of such congresses invitations were extended by the Governments of the countries where the congresses were held, and in this case an invitation was extended last year by the scientists of this country, including among them the Smithsonian Institution, to meet here in Washington next October. For that reason it is important that the joint resolution should be passed at this time.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS IN MISSISSIPPI.

The bill (S. 785) to relinquish, release, and quitclaim all right, title, and interest of the United States of America in and to certain lands in the State of Mississippi was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments, in section 1, page 1, line 6, after the word "east," to insert "Choctaw meridian"; and on page 2, line 5, after the word "heirs," to insert "and assigns"; so as to make the section read:

That the United States of America hereby forever relinquishes, releases, and quitclaims all right, title, and interest in and to the northwest quarter of section 36, township 14 north, range 5 east, Choctaw meridian, situated in the State of Mississippi, now held under claim or color of title by individual or private ownership or municipal ownership, which was reserved, retained, or set apart for James Gipson under and by virtue of the treaty entered into between the United States of America and the Choctaw Nation of Indians on the 27th day of September, A. D. 1830: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect or dispose of any right, claim, or title, if any, which said James Gipson or his heir or heirs and assigns may have in or to any of said land.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INCREASED PAY TO ENLISTED MEN OF THE NAVY.

The bill (S. 2553) to provide for the relief of certain enlisted men in the United States Navy was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with amendments, on page 1, line 4, before the word "second," to insert "first," and, on page 2, line 7, after the word "and," to strike out "have subsequently been checked on account of their inability to prove that they were citizens of the United States during the time they were in receipt of such increased pay, the proper accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to reopen the accounts of such enlisted men and to credit them, respectively, with the amount so checked against them," and insert "checkages thereof have been subsequently made on account of inability to prove United States citizenship during the time of receipt of such increased pay, the proper accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to reopen the accounts of such enlisted men and to credit the amounts so checked to the men, or in cases where men have left the service without having had the amount of said disallowance checked against their accounts, to credit the pay officer who made the payment and in whose account the disallowance has been made," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter the increased pay authorized by law for each rating of the Navy during the first, second, and subsequent periods of service of enlisted men who are citizens of the United States shall be paid to such enlisted men as are otherwise entitled thereto, irrespective of the citizenship of such enlisted men: Provided, That any and all enlisted men who have, subsequent to the 27th day of March, 1906, been carried on the records of the Navy Department as citizens of the United States shall be entitled to any increased pay to which they would have been entitled if citizens of the United States: And provided further, That where any enlisted men of the Navy have received such increased pay and checkages thereof have been subsequently made on account of inability to prove United States citizenship during the time of receipt of such increased pay, the proper accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to reopen the accounts of such enlisted men and to credit the amounts so checked to the men, or in cases where men have left the service without having had the amount of said disallowance checked against their accounts, to credit the pay officer who made the payment and in whose account the disallowance has been made.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS IN BED OF HARLEM SHIP CANAL.

The bill (S. 3672) for the cession to the State of New York, in exchange for the lands required for the project approved by Congress March 4, 1913, of certain lands in the bed of the Harlem Ship Canal, heretofore ceded to the United States, free of cost, and now to be abandoned for the more direct channel, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to cede to the State of New York all the lands heretofore acquired by the United States in the bed of that part of the Harlem River lying outside of the channel lines proposed for the Harlem improvement in project No. 3, printed in House Document No. 557, Sixty-second Congress, second session, to a new bulkhead line to be established by the Secretary of War along the lines of the channel according to the project, but the cession shall take effect only upon the cession to the United States by the State of New York of the land and land under water with any improvements thereon lying between the channel lines proposed in the project, and the possession of the land ceded by the United States to the State of New York shall not be surrendered to the State until and only when the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army shall have certified that the new channel is open for navigation and that the land ceded is no longer necessary for the right of way of the Harlem River Ship Canal.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

BUSINESS PASSED OVER.

The resolution (S. Res. 254) to create a special committee of five Senators to assist the Interstate Commerce Commission in investigating certain facts regarding the methods and practices of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 392) to create in the War Department and Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as "the Civil War volunteer officers' retired list," to authorize placing thereon with retired pay certain surviving officers who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States in the Civil War, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

REPAIRS ON NAVAL VESSELS.

The bill (S. 2538) to repeal sections 1538 and 1539 of the Revised Statutes was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

That sections 1538 and 1539 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to know what those sections of the Revised Statutes are.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado submits a question which the Chair is unable to answer. Perhaps the Senator who reported the bill may afford him some information.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I reported that bill, and I can explain to the Senator my understanding of it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well; I should like to have the explanation.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, in the early sixties, I think, a statute was passed that no repairs should be made to a naval vessel in excess of a very few thousand dollars without a committee from the department being appointed to examine the vessel to see that the repairs would not be excessive. The Secretary of the Navy said to us that the vessels of 1861, as compared with the vessels of 1914, were very cheap affairs, and that it is absolutely nonsense to continue that provision upon the statute book. He asks to have it repealed, and I think the request is a very proper one.

Mr. SMOOT. I notice in the letter from Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Acting Secretary, addressed to the chairman of the committee he says:

For your convenience there is inclosed a draft of a bill in form that would, it is believed, serve the purpose satisfactorily.

I notice the bill itself provides for the repeal of two sections of the Revised Statutes, but there is nothing showing the draft of the bill as submitted by the department, or whether or not the committee accepted that draft.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, the matter was very carefully considered by the Committee on Naval Affairs; and we understand that repealing the objectionable statute—sections 1538 and 1539—will make the matter as the department would like to have it arranged. This bill, which was introduced by the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], was prepared at the department. It may be that some further legislation will be necessary, but we did not so understand it in our consideration of the matter before the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I judged so from what was said there by the Acting Secretary of the Navy; but I will say nothing further about it if the Senator feels that that is correct.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I will state that the letter from the Navy Department is dated June 14 and this bill was introduced June 17. The presumption is that it is the very bill which they transmitted.

Mr. PAGE. I am sure this is the bill transmitted by the Navy Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the further consideration of the bill objected to? The Chair hears no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NEW YORK AND NEW JERSEY JOINT HARBOR LINE COMMISSION.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 29) authorizing the President to appoint a member of the New Jersey and New York Joint Harbor Line Commission was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, on page 2, line 2, after the words "United States Army," to insert the word "retired," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized to designate an officer of the Corps of Engineers, United States Army, retired, whose assignment of duty relates to harbor work in, or in the neighborhood of, New York Harbor, to act as a member of the said New Jersey and New York Joint Harbor Line Commission: Provided, That no expense shall accrue to the United States by reason of such appointment, and the officer designated may receive such compensation for his services on said commission as may be provided by the States aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think these "whereases," or the preamble, ought to be stricken from the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the preamble will be stricken out.

BILL PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 121) to provide that petty officers, noncommissioned officers, and enlisted men of the United States Navy and Marine Corps on the retired list who had creditable Civil War service shall receive the rank or rating and the pay of the next higher enlisted grade, was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

TRAFFIC IN OPIUM.

The bill (H. R. 6282) to provide for the registration of, with collectors of internal revenue, and to impose a special tax upon all persons who produce, import, manufacture, compound, deal in, dispense, sell, distribute, or give away opium or coca leaves, their salts, derivatives, or preparations, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is a very important bill, and I should like to see it passed this afternoon. The Senator reporting the bill is not present, however, and I have some suggestions here which I wish to make.

Mr. THOMAS. I have been requested to represent the Finance Committee on this measure when it is reached. It is a very important bill. It is also one which ought to be passed just as soon as possible. I should like, therefore, to proceed with it. I also have a number of amendments which have been suggested and which I think will be accepted.

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps the Senator has the same amendments that I have.

Mr. THOMAS. These are the amendments proposed by the national drug trade congress.

Mr. SMOOT. Those are the ones to which I had reference.

Mr. THOMAS. I may say to the Senator that this bill is the result of an extended conference which I held with the representatives of this body some time ago.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, do I understand that this bill comes up under the five-minute rule?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does; yes.

Mr. JONES. It seems to me an important measure like this should be considered in a little bit better way than it can be considered under that rule.

Mr. THOMAS. The bill has been considered very fully in committee. It came over from the House very early in the special session. It is very necessary that the bill shall be enacted into law as early as possible, owing to the fact that it is necessary to carry out and make effective the provisions of a treaty relating to the same subject, concerning which three bills have been reported in the House, two of which have been enacted into law.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I will suggest to the Senator from Washington that if at any time during the consideration of the bill the Senator concludes it is not being maturely considered, its further consideration can be objected to, and it will go over.

Mr. JONES. The bill seems to be quite a long one, containing several pages, and this is a long calendar. There are a great many important bills on it which might be disposed of to-day.

Mr. THOMAS. The bill is one of considerable detail, but, generally speaking, it is essential, as I state, to make effective treaty stipulations. It is a plain bill, and I do not think its consideration will take much longer than the time necessary to read it.

Mr. JONES. I shall not object, then, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have received some communications on the subject of this bill, and I should prefer that it be not considered this afternoon until I can have an opportunity to go over those letters.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask, if it is proper, from whom the letters are that the Senator has received?

Mr. POMERENE. One letter I have received is from Prof. J. H. Beal, of Scio, Ohio.

Mr. THOMAS. Is he connected with what is called "The Dr. Tucker asthma specific"?

Mr. POMERENE. He is not, so far as I know. It may be that he is. I do not know. He is the chairman of the committee that has in charge the revision of the United States Pharmacopœia, and he is the editor of a pharmacists' journal, and one of the ablest chemists in the country. I know him personally, and have known him for 25 years.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, I am unable to go on with the bill, under the rules, if there is objection; but I wish I could impress upon the Senator from Ohio the tremendous importance of placing this bill upon the statute books as soon as possible.

Mr. POMERENE. I have no objection to its being taken up by Monday. That will give me a little time to look into these communications.

Mr. THOMAS. The probabilities are that if the bill goes over until Monday, it will go over until the next calling of the calendar, and will have to take its usual place.

Mr. POMERENE. Ordinarily I would not ask this; but I have known Prof. Beal so long and I have such great confidence in his ability and his intelligent understanding of the subject, that I feel justified in asking that the bill be passed over until Monday.

Mr. THOMAS. I have no doubt that the Senator's correspondent is well informed, and perhaps interested in the measure. In view of the fact that it has been the subject of consideration and discussion by the Finance Committee for so long a period of time, I have no doubt, as I said, that it has received full consideration. I think we should go ahead with the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

Mr. BURTON. I understood objection has been made?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; it has.

Mr. THOMAS. Objection has been made by the Senator's colleague.

Mr. BURTON. If I may offer a suggestion, I think the bill might be read, considered as in Committee of the Whole, reported to the Senate, and then postponed for any further modification which it might be desired to make. It is an extremely important bill.

Mr. THOMAS. That is perfectly satisfactory to me, if it is to the junior Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall object to that, if that is all we are going to do this afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio asks to have the bill read and go as far as having it reported from the Committee of the Whole to the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. I have no objection to that if I can be given an opportunity to offer amendments, if I decide to offer any, on Monday.

Mr. SMOOT. I object to its being taken up in that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection having been made to the consideration of the bill, it will be passed over.

EDWARD WILLIAM BAILEY.

The bill (S. 1270) for the relief of Edward William Bailey was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Edward William Bailey, of Portsmouth, Va., the sum of $1,500 for injuries resulting from the total loss of one eye and the serious impairment of the other eye, caused by a wound received by him at the hands of a target party of United States sailors and marines while engaged at target practice at St. Helena, near Norfolk, Va., on or about November 7, 1890.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIEUT. HENRY O. SLAYTON.

The bill (S. 686) to restore to the active list First Lieut. of Engineers Henry O. Slayton, retired, United States Revenue-Cutter Service, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to restore to the active list of the Revenue-Cutter Service Henry O. Slayton, first lieutenant of engineers, United States Revenue-Cutter Service, retired, as an extra number, to take rank as No. 18 on the list of first lieutenants of engineers, provided he is found physically fit for active duty by a medical board appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REFUND OF INTERNAL-REVENUE TAX.

The bill (S. 1213) to provide for the refunding of certain moneys illegally assessed and collected in the district of Utah was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates to the corporations hereafter named the amounts respectively placed opposite their names, said amounts having been illegally assessed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and collected by the collector of internal revenue for the district of Utah in 1879 as a tax on notes used for circulation and paid out, such tax having been held illegal by the Supreme Court of the United States: Zion's Cooperative Mercantile Institution, of Bountiful, Utah, $123.30; Logan Branch of Zion's Cooperative Mercantile Institution, of Logan, Utah, $4,852.42.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, is there a report from the department on this bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that there is, and this is in conformity with a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELDREDGE BROS. LIVE STOCK CO.

The bill (S. 2469) for the relief of the Eldredge Bros. Live Stock Co., a corporation, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to the Eldredge Bros. Live Stock Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Utah, the sum of $2,738.73 and pay to said corporation the said amount out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, same being duties collected from said corporation on cattle temporarily driven into the United States from Canada.

Mr. SHEPPARD. What is the amount involved in this bill, Mr. President?

Mr. SMOOT. $2,738.73. I will say to the Senator that representatives of the Eldredge Bros. Co., a Canadian stock concern, came to the United States and leased a part of a forest reserve from the Forest Service. When they came to the line to bring the cattle over temporarily these duties were collected on them. The cattle were over here for only a few months, and during those few months they grazed upon the lands in the forest reserve, and the corporation paid the grazing fees to the department. Then the cattle returned. In coming over, however, duties were assessed on the cattle, and of course when they went back it was impossible to get the money out of the Treasury without an act of Congress.

That is all there is to the case.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.

The bill (H. R. 6827) to amend an act entitled "An act to change the name of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service to the Public Health Service, to increase the pay of officers of said service, and for other purposes," approved August 14, 1912, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine, with amendments, on page 2, line 1, after the word "upon," to strike out "the property of all common carriers, when engaged in interstate commerce, for the purpose of ascertaining whether," and insert "all"; in line 4, after the word "kind," to strike out "and depots, premises, and property of" and insert "and"; in line 5, after the word "to," to strike out "such" and insert "common"; in line 6, after the word "carriers," to strike out "are"; in line 7, after the word "commerce," to insert "for the purpose of ascertaining whether they are"; and in line 12, after the word "conveyances," to strike out "and depots, premises, and property of every kind," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved August 14, 1912, chapter 288, entitled "An act to change the name of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service to the Public Health Service, to increase the pay of officers of said service, and for other purposes," be amended by the addition of the following section thereto:

"SEC. 3. That the officers of the Public Health Service may enter upon all the vessels, vehicles, trains, carriages, or conveyances of any and every kind and every description belonging to common carriers, while such carriers are engaged in interstate commerce, for the purpose of ascertaining whether they are kept by them in a sanitary condition. And the Secretary of the Treasury and the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission are authorized to make all such reasonable rules and regulations as may be necessary to secure the keeping of such vessels, vehicles, trains, carriages, or conveyances in a sanitary condition by such carriers while engaged in interstate commerce, and to request the Attorney General to cause to be instituted such legal proceedings in the district courts of the United States as may be necessary to compel the observance of such rules and regulations by said carriers."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

COMPILATION OF NAVAL LAWS.

The next business on the calendar was Senate resolution 262, and the Senate proceeded to its consideration.

The resolution had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with amendments, on page 1, line 3, after the word "compilation," to insert "with complete index," and on line 8, after the word "compilation," to insert "not to exceed $3,000," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to prepare and submit to the Senate at its next regular session, or as soon thereafter as practicable, a compilation, with complete index, of existing laws relating to the Navy, Navy Department, and Marine Corps, with annotations showing how such laws have been construed and applied by the Navy Department, the Comptroller of the Treasury, the Attorney General, or the courts, the cost of said compilation, not to exceed $3,000, to be covered by appropriations to be reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

JAMES W. KEEN.

The bill (S. 685) to appoint James W. Keen as master's mate in the Revenue-Cutter Service and to place him as such upon the retired list was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that bill go over.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not ask that the bill go over.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to understand what it is about. It seems to me this is simply a promotion of a man with a view to letting him retire.

Mr. JONES. I will say that the last paragraph in the report of the department explains it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield, in order to know something about the bill.

Mr. JONES. The first part of the letter gives the details of the service, and it concludes as follows:

Pilot Keen is 70 years of age, and since 1869 has served 21 years as pilot on vessels of the Revenue-Cutter Service. Practically all of this duty has been in Alaskan waters, and especially arduous, and has been faithfully performed.

In view of the foregoing facts I recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Very well. I withdraw the objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint James W. Keen to the office and grade of master's mate in the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States and to place him on the retired list, with the pay proper for a retired warrant officer of that grade.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HUGH P. STRONG.

The bill (H. R. 1262) for the relief of Hugh P. Strong was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It gives to Hugh P. Strong, of Superior, Wis., the right, within two years after the passage of this act, to select, make entry, and file upon any 160 acres of public land subject to homestead entry; and provides that upon payment of any fees, commissions, or purchase money due in connection therewith, and after publication and posting of notice of his said selection or entry for 30 days, under direction of the register of the land district wherein the lands are situated, and in the absence of valid protest or objection, he shall be entitled to receive a patent therefor under the general homestead laws without the necessity of establishing, maintaining, or proving residence and cultivation upon the same, for the reason that said Hugh P. Strong duly made homestead entry No. 2096, upon which patent was issued by the United States to said Hugh P. Strong on January 19, 1898, but which patent was canceled by virtue of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States October 29, 1906.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

The bill (S. 3878) to validate certain homestead entries was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to ask the author of this bill whether it involves the contest rights of anybody?

Mr. SMOOT. None whatever. I will say that the bill was drawn by the department something like a year ago. I believe it passed the House, but not in time to pass the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. It does not attempt to deal with homesteads where it might settle controversies between contestants?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, not at all. It applies only to homesteaders whose former entries did not contain 160 acres.

Mr. BORAH. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 4, after the word "to," it is proposed to strike out "September 1, 1911," and insert "January 1, 1914," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That all pending homestead entries made in good faith prior to January 1, 1914, under the provisions of the enlarged homestead laws, by persons who before making such enlarged homestead entry had acquired title to land under the homestead laws and therefore were not qualified to make an enlarged homestead entry, be, and the same are hereby, validated, if in all other respects regular, in all cases where the original homestead entry was for less than 160 acres of land.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DANIEL M. FROST.

The bill (S. 1807) for the relief of Daniel M. Frost was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That Daniel M. Frost be authorized to make a homestead entry for an unappropriated quarter section of public land, subject to said entry, as though his former entry No. 6595, Larned, Kans., series, had not been made.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to allow said Frost credit for the residence and cultivation had by him in connection with said Larned entry as though it were had on said second entry, when proof is submitted on the latter.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CRATER LAKE NATIONAL PARK FUND.

The bill (S. 2223) to create the Crater Lake National Park revenue fund was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope that the Senator from North Carolina will not ask that the bill shall go over. It is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, as well as by the Secretary of the Interior.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina withdraw his objection?

Mr. OVERMAN. The bill reverses the entire policy of the Government for years and there will be quite a debate on it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator from North Carolina will give me just a moment, I will say that it is unifying the law.

Mr. OVERMAN. It requires the money to be held in somebody else's hands instead of going into the Treasury. All moneys derived from licenses or otherwise ought to go into the Treasury, and then let any appropriation that is necessary be made by Congress. We can never understand where we are when we let some one hold money here and another hold money there. It should be the policy of the Government to let all money go into the Treasury, and let all appropriations be made from the Treasury.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator is going to object anyhow, all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection having been made, the bill goes over.

J. A. MATHENY.

The bill (H. R. 2733) authorizing J. A. Matheny, of Colony, Wyo., to make homestead entry, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes J. A. Matheny, of Colony, Wyo., to make homestead entry embracing the south half of the southwest quarter, the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter, and the southeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section 20, township 56 north, range 61 west of the sixth principal meridian in Wyoming, after Floyd Compton's entry therefor shall have been canceled, and to secure title to the same upon satisfactory proof of compliance with the provisions of the homestead laws.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES GUNNING.

The bill (S. 3817) authorizing the issuance of a patent to James Gunning for lot 2, section 32, township 29 north, range 39 east, Montana, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment to add at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That no adverse right had accrued to said tract prior to February 1, 1914.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue patent to James Gunning for lot 2, section 32, township 29 north, range 39 east, Montana: Provided, That no adverse right had accrued to said tract prior to February 1, 1914.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DANIEL HAMPTON.

The bill (S. 55) for the relief of Daniel Hampton was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any branch thereof, Daniel Hampton, who was a member of Company D, Twenty-fourth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, and of Company G, Twenty-fourth Veteran Reserve Corps, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of the last-named organization on the 14th day of August, 1865. But no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The bill (S. 4552) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors was announced as next in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think from the character of the bill there will probably be amendments to it, and all that sort of thing, and it may take some time. I ask that it go over, so that we can get to the other cases on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

VOLUNTEER FORCES.

The bill (H. R. 7138) to provide for raising the volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let the bill be read, and I will reserve my right to object after the bill has been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I think if the bill is going to be objected to we had better save the time the reading would take.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is objection to it.

Mr. SHIVELY. Let it go over.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask that it may go over. It is an important bill and there may be amendments to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

QUARANTINE FACILITIES AT PORTLAND, ME.

The bill (H. R. 4618) to increase the limit of cost for increased quarantine facilities at the port of Portland, Me., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to increase the limit of cost for increased quarantine facilities at the port of Portland, Me., authorized by the act approved August 24, 1912, by the additional sum of $23,620.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The bill (H. R. 11269) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, on page 1, line 6, after the word "Company," to strike out the letter "D" and insert the letter "B," so as to make the clause read:

The name of William S. Nash, late of Company B, Eleventh Regiment Missouri Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 9, before the word "dependent," to insert "helpless and," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Edward D. Henderson, helpless and dependent child of Jacob Henderson, late of Company B, Forty-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This seems to be quite a long bill, and there are a good many items in it. I ask that it may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection to the further consideration of the bill having been made, the bill goes over.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BANGOR, ME.

The bill (S. 3176) to increase the limit of cost of the public building at Bangor, Me., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment to strike out "or so much thereof as may be necessary to meet the additional cost of construction of said building by the substitution of stone for two of the walls instead of brick, as specified in the existing contract," and insert "and the building shall be so constructed that all of its exterior façades shall be faced with stone," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the limit of cost of the public building at Bangor, Me., be, and the same is hereby, increased $40,000, and the building shall be so constructed that all of its exterior façades shall be faced with stone.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MAIL CHUTES IN PUBLIC BUILDING AT CLEVELAND, OHIO.

The bill (S. 4182) to authorize the installation of mail chutes in the public building at Cleveland, Ohio, and to appropriate money therefor, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in line 6, to strike out "$640" and in lieu to insert "$800," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to contract for and to have installed in the public building at Cleveland, Ohio, suitable mail chutes, and a sum not exceeding $800 is hereby appropriated for said purpose out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Can the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds give us some explanation of the bill?

Mr. SWANSON. It is to install mail chutes in the public building at Cleveland to carry letters up and down. They will save a great deal of time and labor.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Is there a precedent for it?

Mr. SWANSON. Very frequent appropriations have been made installing mail chutes in public buildings.

Mr. SHEPPARD. What I mean to ask is whether there is a precedent for doing it by special legislation?

Mr. SWANSON. The reason why this is done by special act instead of in the omnibus bill is that some of these buildings are in process of construction, and if the money is not expended now for the purpose the work can not be done at all. The only bills which are being considered now by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds are those of such an urgent character that they can not wait upon the omnibus bill. I have not reported any except where the demand was so urgent for the construction or for other purposes that it was thought they ought to precede the general bill.

Mr. HUGHES. I call the attention of the Senator from Texas to the fact that the report states that the appropriation for the construction of the building has been exhausted, and that there is no general fund out of which this amount can be appropriated. Consequently this legislation is necessary.

Mr. BURTON. I understand the question of the Senator from Texas is whether there is not some general appropriation. The question of providing for this improvement has been presented to the department. While recognizing its desirability—I may say the necessity for it—they say they have no appropriation available for it, and the passage of this bill is necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

APPRAISERS' STORES BUILDING AT MILWAUKEE, WIS.

The bill (H. R. 5487) to authorize an additional appropriation for the erection of the United States appraisers' stores building at Milwaukee, Wis., was announced as next in order.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not find any report accompanying the bill.

Mr. SWANSON. The bill was reported by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON], and as it is a House bill, I suppose he intended to adopt the House report.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Let the bill go over.

Mr. SWANSON. It is a bill which has passed the House and there is an urgent necessity for this building. The funds were not sufficient to construct this building, and it is required there. They need more space, and it is being delayed on account of insufficiency of funds in the adoption of suitable plans and specifications.

Mr. HUGHES. Does the Senator from Virginia know anything about this particular bill?

Mr. SWANSON. All I know is that we examined it, it passed the House, and it was understood that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] would prepare a report.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been objected to, it will go over.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT GEORGETOWN, DEL.

The bill (S. 1832) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Georgetown, in the State of Delaware, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment to strike out, after the word "directed," in line 4, "to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post office and other Government offices in Georgetown, in the State of Delaware, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, complete, not to exceed the sum of $75,000. Proposals for the sale of land suitable for said site shall be invited by public advertisement in one or more of the newspapers of said town of largest circulation for at least 20 days prior to the date specified in said advertisement for the opening of said proposals. Proposals made in response to said advertisement shall be addressed and mailed to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall then cause the said proposed site and such others as he may think proper to designate to be examined in person by an agent of the Treasury Department, who shall make written report to said Secretary of the results of said examination and of his recommendation thereon and the reasons therefor, which shall be accompanied by the original proposals and all maps, plats, and statements which shall have come into his possession relating to the said proposed sites. The building shall be unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet on each side, including streets and alleys," and, in lieu thereof, to insert "to expend a sum not exceeding $10,000 for the purchase of a site for the erection of a Federal building in the town of Georgetown, Del.," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to expend a sum not exceeding $10,000 for the purchase of a site for the erection of a Federal building in the town of Georgetown, Del.

Mr. THOMAS. I notice that the bill as originally introduced assumes to appropriate $75,000. The amendment reduces the amount to $10,000. I should like to have from the chairman of the committee some explanation of the reduction.

Mr. SWANSON. It was intended to purchase the site and also to erect a building thereon. The last public-buildings act precludes the erection of a building at any place unless the receipts amount to $10,000. The receipts at this office were not sufficient to justify the erection of a building under the law passed, but only justified the purchase of a site.

Mr. SMOOT. Has the committee any rule as to the amount of receipts from an office to justify the purchase of a site?

Mr. SWANSON. We have not any rule except the one Congress has fixed. Congress has fixed the rule that there must be receipts to the amount of $6,000 before a site can be purchased and receipts to the amount of $10,000 before a building can be erected. The last public-buildings act contained that provision.

Mr. KENYON. What is the use of a site, if a building can not be erected upon it?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, may I add that the receipts of this office are well above the requirement fixed by the law to which the Senator from Virginia refers, and, in addition, that rule applies only where the building is needed for post-office purposes. In this case, in addition to post-office purposes, the Civil Service Commission desire to have a room in the building when it is erected. So, although I did not press it for that purpose, that additional use might justify the erection of a building at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. I notice there is no report from the department on the bill.

Mr SAULSBURY. There was a report to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds showing the receipts and the additional space needed and the space needed by the Civil Service Commission. I may say to the Senator I am very familiar with this particular town and this particular location, and there are some advantages, I think, in making a purchase of the site at this time because of opportunities to purchase which may not be possible later on. There are two or three very available places now, and the most available can be purchased probably for the amount named in the bill, while that may not be the case in a very short time.

Mr. THOMAS. I inquire of the Senator what is the population?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not remember.

Mr. THOMAS. Approximately.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Approximately, I should say 2,000 to 2,500. It is a county seat.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not object to the present consideration of the bill. I merely wanted to ascertain why there had been a reduction made from $75,000 to $10,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the purchase of a site for the erection of a Federal building at Georgetown, Del."

WILLIAM M. CARROLL.

The bill (S. 227) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of William M. Carroll was announced as next in order.

Mr. VARDAMAN. What is the report of the committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi asks what the report of the committee may be.

The SECRETARY. Report of the Committee on Military Affairs, No. 282.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I ask that the bill may go over.

Mr. KENYON. I ask the Senator not to do that. This is one of the most meritorious bills on the calendar. I would be glad briefly to tell the Senator the situation.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not want to object to it, but I have not had time to read the report. I do not wish to delay the Senate.

Mr. KENYON. I will say that Mr. Carroll was a mere boy when he entered the war. He joined an Ohio company and served for a year.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The bill has a favorable report from the committee?

Mr. KENYON. It has.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. KENYON. I would be glad to explain it fully, but the Senator withdraws the objection.

The bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of William M. Carroll, late of Company H, Seventeenth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry, and to grant to him an honorable discharge.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the wording of the bill. It does not contain the usual provision in bills of this kind. It ought, in the opinion of the Chair, to be so amended.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let the usual proviso be inserted.

Mr. KENYON. I ask that that be inserted.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emolument shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 2902) to reduce fees in the United States district courts, to fix the salaries of the clerks of such courts, to increase the mileage and per diem of witnesses and jurymen therein, and to repeal section 840 of the Revised Statutes and all other conflicting laws was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that bill go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over.

The bill (S. 67) for the relief of Emory Scott Land was announced as next in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

TRUSTEES OF DAVENPORT FEMALE COLLEGE.

The bill (S. 4262) for the relief of the trustees of the Davenport Female College was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 7, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$3,000" and to insert "$2,000," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the trustees of Davenport Female College, situated in the town of Lenoir, N. C., the sum of $2,000 for injuries done the buildings and destroying the property of said institution by the Federal soldiers at the close of the late Civil War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND FOR PUBLIC BUILDING AT RICHMOND, VA.

The bill (S. 4159) to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, additional land for the post office, courthouse, and customhouse in the city of Richmond, Va., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, the remainder of the block, bounded by Main, Tenth, Eleventh, and Bank Streets, in which the post office, courthouse, and customhouse, in the city of Richmond, Commonwealth of Virginia, is located, at a cost not exceeding $600,000.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Virginia whether this is designed or will be designed as a monument for the purpose of commemorating the union between the two sections?

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I merely wish to say in connection with this bill that legislation of this character is very urgently needed and there is necessity for the immediate passage of the bill. The Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Newton, has written to the chairman of the committee of the House and the chairman of the Senate committee urging the passage of the bill. Richmond needs about 19,600 additional feet of space to provide adequate facilities in the public building there to accommodate the business of the Government; and there is no way of getting it except by the purchase of the remainder of the block on which the Government building now stands. If the Government does not get this property and increase its present facilities, it will be compelled to erect a public building elsewhere in the city at an expense of perhaps several million dollars. By obtaining this space the Government will obviate the necessity of purchasing any other land in Richmond and there will be no necessity for the erection of an entirely new building there, as this property has on it buildings which can be used to supply the present needs of the Government until the public building now on the property can be enlarged and extended.

I repeat that the Secretary of the Treasury has urged the passage of this bill on the chairman of the committee of the House and the chairman of the committee of the Senate. The owners of this land are about to erect on it a 22-story building, which, as I understand, is now under contract. In view of that fact the necessity of acquiring the property for Government purposes has become very urgent.

The Government sent an inspector there to make an investigation, and he has reported that it is exceedingly desirable that the Government obtain this land. I repeat that all the Government officials having to do with the matter have urged the necessity of the immediate passage of this bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PATENT FOR HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

The bill (H. R. 11102) providing that the marriage of a homestead entryman to a homestead entrywoman shall not impair the right of either to a patent, after compliance with the law a year, to apply to existing entries, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARINE-HOSPITAL BUILDING AT SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

The bill (S. 3988) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be erected a suitable building or buildings for marine-hospital purposes on the present marine-hospital site at San Francisco, Cal., and to remove all or any of the present structures on said site, was announced as next in order.

Mr. CHILTON. Let the bill go over, Mr. President.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I think the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] is very much interested in having this bill passed.

Mr. PERKINS. I think no Senator will object to it if he will read the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject.

Mr. CHILTON. I withdraw my objection to the present consideration of the bill, Mr. President.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be erected on such portion of the present marine-hospital site at San Francisco, Cal., as he may select, a suitable building or buildings for marine-hospital purposes, at a total limit of cost of not to exceed $500,000, including heating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, complete.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GRAND CALUMET RIVER, IND.

The bill (S. 3529) to change the location and straighten the course of the channel of the Grand Calumet River through the lands of the Gary Land Co. and the Indiana Steel Co., and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHIVELY. I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk, to come in on page 4, line 6, after the word "less."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 6, after the word "less," it is proposed to insert "said curve having a radius of 11,563.2 feet."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 4377) to provide for the construction of four revenue cutters was announced as next in order.

Mr. THOMAS. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 12045) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war was announced as next in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, as the character of that bill is such that it might involve some discussion or amendment, I ask that it go over temporarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION, MARSHALLTOWN, IOWA.

The bill (H. R. 8683) to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Treasury to relinquish the rights of the United States in and to a part of a certain alley in the city of Marshalltown, Iowa, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, do I understand that this bill provides for a gift of land to the Young Men's Christian Association by the United States Government?

Mr. SWANSON. No. I will explain the bill. Under the law of Iowa it is impossible for anybody to secure title to land in an alley, even by the gift of the city, unless the adjoining landowners consent. The city owns this alley, but the Government has some land adjoining it. The city has conveyed the land to the Young Men's Christian Association, and this bill is simply to give the Government's consent to that conveyance.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The explanation is sufficient.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PATENTS AND SURVEYS OF PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

The bill (S. 1943) in reference to the issuance of patents and copies of surveys of private land claims was announced as next in order, and the Secretary read the bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I should like to have the report on that bill read.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

REMOVAL OF SNOW AND ICE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (S. 3696) providing for the removal of snow and ice from the paved sidewalks of the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that bill go over under Rule IX.

Mr. BURTON. That is really a very important bill. Why should it go over under Rule IX?

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to hear some explanation of it.

Mr. BURTON. It is a bill for the removal of snow and ice in the District of Columbia.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, I will merely ask that it go over. There is no snow and ice now; the springtime has come.

Mr. BURTON. There appears to be a kind of inertia in reference to this matter; whenever there is snow, it is said that it is useless to pass the bill in the Senate, because its provisions could not be enforced at an early date, and in the springtime such a bill is thought unnecessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over, under objection.

Mr. BRISTOW. I wish to suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that now is a good time to get some legislation of that kind, so that we may have it next winter. After the snow and ice come, men skate around over this town and fall down.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have noticed since I have been here that whenever there is a snowstorm here we are requested to appropriate five or ten or fifteen or twenty thousand dollars to remove the snow and ice while they are on the ground. However, the bill has gone over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator requests that the bill go over without prejudice, and not that it go over under Rule IX?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

WILBUR F. LAWTON.

The bill (S. 4032) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Wilbur F. Lawton was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Wilbur F. Lawton, who was a sergeant of Company K, Twenty-eighth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been under military control on October 31, 1861, and not absent without leave on that date or at any other time in that year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Wilbur F. Lawton."

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 4657) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Unless there is some reason that some Senator will suggest to the contrary, I am ready to offer a motion to adjourn, but before I do so——

Mr. BORAH. Will not the Senator defer that to allow Calendar No. 258 to be considered? It is a very short bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will not now make the motion, Mr. President.

Mr. OVERMAN. I object to order of business 255 and order of business 257, so that we may come to order of business 258.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the objection of the Senator from North Carolina, Order of Business 255, being Senate bill 4657, and Order of Business 257, being Senate bill 4161, will be passed over.

SARAH A. CLINTON AND MARIE STEINBERG.

The bill (S. 604) for the relief of Sarah A. Clinton and Marie Steinberg was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Sarah A. Clinton $400 and to Marie Steinberg $400, in repayment of the purchase money paid in such amounts to the Department of the Interior by Sarah A. Clinton and Marie Steinberg, respectively, in connection with timber and stone entries made by them and subsequently relinquished by them.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHIVELY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 15 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, March 30, 1914, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate March 28, 1914.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 28, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou great Spirit, ever near to us and always ready to help those who seek Thee; keep us, we beseech Thee, close to Thee, that amid the trials, temptations, and allurements which environ us we may possess our souls in peace and go forward to duty's call seeking the approbation of our own conscience, knowing that we shall thus have Thine approval. May we ever remember that "he that is slow to anger is better than the mighty, and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city," that we may eat the fruits of righteousness and satisfy the desires of our better self, in Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I had a special resolution that I desired to call up this morning. The resolution adopted yesterday with reference to the consideration of the Panama tolls bill prevents my calling it up. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Reserving the right to object, the resolution to which the gentleman from Oklahoma refers is a resolution that was reported to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. That is the one.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The committee would have been ready to report it if they could have obtained the opportunity to do so to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will not get any opportunity to-day, in the judgment of the Chair.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. My object in rising is to state that the committee would have been ready to report the resolution if it had had the opportunity.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman's statement.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I have no objection to the request.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4352. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 1759. An act to reimburse certain fire insurance companies the amounts paid by them for property destroyed by fire in suppressing the bubonic plague in the Territory of Hawaii in the years 1899 and 1900;

S. 2069. An act for the reimbursement of Jacob Wirth for two horses lost while hired by the United States Geological Survey;

S. 2590. An act to reimburse Charles C. Crowell for two months' extra pay in lieu of traveling expenses; and

S. 110. An act to regulate trading in cotton futures and provide for the standardization of "upland" and "gulf" cottons separately.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the unfinished business, the Sims bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. ADAMSON. I understand that the other side desire to yield some time.

The SPEAKER. If nobody wants to speak, the Chair will put the question.

Mr. DOREMUS. I yield 13 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] is recognized for 13 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that in the discussion of this very important question sufficient time would be alloted to those who desired to take part in the debate so that they could discuss it fully; but because of the "generous" action of the Rules Committee, sanctioned by this House on yesterday in forcing their rule through, I am forced to content myself with answering only partly and briefly some of the arguments of the proponents of this measure and by inserting in the RECORD an elaboration of my views with respect to the alleged violation of the treaty with England.

I had hoped that in the discussion of this question my Democratic colleagues, at least, would discuss it in such a dispassionate and cool manner as would cause no ill feeling and impute no bad motives to any of their colleagues in this House. [Applause.] But the discussion has taken such a wide range that, forsooth, they have seen fit not only to indict the distinguished committee on resolutions of the Baltimore convention but they have impugned the motives of those men who in the Sixty-second Congress voted for free tolls with an honest conviction. They have gone further than that, and they have impeached the good intentions of the leaders of our party here. I can not believe that the plank with respect to free tolls was sneaked into the Baltimore platform. I have too much faith in the intelligence and the integrity of the members of my party who made up that committee, dominated by its chairman, the present Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan, to believe any such action was taken.

The report of that committee was sanctioned by that convention, and I can not understand why, when my good friends the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] and the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] spoke in many parts of this country in the last campaign asking the people to place the Democratic Party in power, and promising them that if they did so that party would redeem every pledge of its platform, they did not then raise their voice against this particular plank of the platform. [Applause.] It would, indeed, have come with better grace if they had at that time said that the Democratic Party in convention assembled at Baltimore had played some skin game upon the American people. It comes with bad grace for them to say it now. I want to say in this connection that since I became a Member of this House I have never seen any act of any Member here, be he Republican, Progressive, or Democrat, that I thought was prompted by dishonest motives. I always ascribe to my colleagues here honest purposes and good intentions, and I say it comes with bad grace, indeed, for a Democrat upon this floor to have his motives impugned because he would stand by the platform of his party and vote his honest convictions. [Applause.] Let me remind those gentlemen that it was the record made by the Democratic minority in the Sixty-first Congress, led by the distinguished Speaker of this House, that insured a majority of Democrats in the Sixty-second Congress. [Applause.]

Let me also recall to your minds, my colleagues, that it was the record of a Democratic majority in the Sixty-second Congress, under the honest motives and magnificent leadership of CHAMP CLARK and OSCAR UNDERWOOD, that caused our victorious banner to sweep the country in the election of 1912. [Prolonged applause.] I have never yet in my short career here seen one act of these gentlemen that I thought was prompted by bad motives or dishonest purposes. [Applause.] I believe they are as honest in the stand they have taken in this matter and are prompted by the same sincere convictions as those of you who differ with me here. I think that the President of this Nation is a patriotic, sincere, and able man. He is, in my opinion, the greatest President this Nation has seen since the days of Jefferson. [Applause.] I believe that the course he has pursued in this matter is prompted by the most honest purposes. But men are not infallible. Their judgment is not always correct. I have never heard a more eloquent speech delivered in this House than that delivered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] on yesterday. [Applause.] But when he says that the Congress of the United States, made up of the representatives of the American people, should surrender to the President in matters that affect our treaty relations with a foreign country, when that treaty affects the domestic affairs of this Nation, I say he goes too far, indeed. [Applause.]

If to-day you pass this repeal bill and your views are sanctioned by the American people, I believe it is the beginning of the end of party organization in this country.

We must keep the faith and redeem the pledges made to the people in our platforms. [Applause.]

ON THE TREATY.

This controversy between England and the United States, if arising out of the construction of treaties, necessarily involves the treaty of 1850, known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and the treaty of 1901, known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

The latter supercedes the former, and both were consummated under the following circumstances: The discovery of gold in California emphasized the desirability of constructing a transisthmian canal connecting the Atlantic and Pacific waters. The route generally considered at that time as the most feasible was through the San Juan River and Lake Nicaragua. In 1849 a treaty was entered into between Nicaragua and the United States whereby Nicaragua conceded to an American company the right to build a canal from San Juan on the Caribbean Sea, through the San Juan River and Lake Nicaragua to the Pacific. Two obstacles stood in the way of the company's operations. One was England's pretensions in Nicaragua, the other was the lack of capital. This Government deemed England's pretensions in Nicaragua sufficient to enter into a treaty with her. Consequently the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was signed, taking its name from the representatives of this country and England.

By this treaty the two Governments assumed joint protectorate over the canal and over the private corporation which they expected to build the canal.

They both agreed, among other things, that neither would erect fortifications there, and to cooperate in guaranteeing the neutrality of the canal to be opened to the world and common to all nations.

At this time, however, two other routes had been suggested—one through the Mexican Province of Tehauntepec and the other through the Isthmus of Panama. For this reason another article was inserted in the treaty. This article was numbered 8, the general principle of which, under the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, it is our duty not to impair.

In 1901 all hope of constructing the canal through private individuals or corporations under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty had been abandoned, and the United States was looking to the Isthmus of Panama for a route through which to construct the canal. Great Britain claimed no protectorate or domain or sovereignty over the Isthmus of Panama.

The United States entered into negotiations with Panama and acquired the territory. This Government owns the land through which the canal is being constructed. England does not, nor has she ever claimed any interest in the Isthmus of Panama. But in 1901, when the United States abandoned the idea of promoting or encouraging private capitalists to construct the canal through the San Juan River and Lake Nicaragua route, which England was interested in, and to construct for this Government and at this Government's expense a canal over the Panama route, we entered into negotiations with England, repealing the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and adopting in its stead the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

I desire to insert here, so far as this discussion is concerned, the material parts of that treaty:

ARTICLE 1. The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th of April, 1850.

ART. 2. It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ART. 3. The United States adopts as the basis of neutralization of such ship canal the following rules substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th day of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say:

"1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

"2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

"3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service. Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of belligerents.

"4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

"5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

"6. The plant, establishment, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be a part thereof for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal."

The preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty recites that it is—desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th of April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention.

Now, it is contended by those who have aligned themselves with the English view that the expression "without impairing the general principle of neutralization in article 8 of that convention" impairs in many respects the right of the United States from controlling and regulating the Panama Canal.

Article 8 of the treaty of 1850 reads as follows:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired in entering into this convention to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

Now, so far as affects this discussion, this is the only article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that, it is contended, affects the construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and the only effect this article could possibly have in the present Hay-Pauncefote treaty is that in construing the Hay-Pauncefote treaty "the general principle of neutralization established in article 8" shall not be impaired. It can not affect the subject of tolls or traffic or regulation generally of the canal by the United States, but only the question of neutralization, and means no more or less than that the "general principle of neutralization as established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty shall not be impaired." Now, what is meant by "general principle of neutralization"?

The "general principle of neutralization" here referred to was that the canal which was about to be built by the Government of the United States should be free and open to the commerce of the world, both in peace and in war.

So, if when the canal shall have been completed and the United States Government opens and operates the canal to the enjoyment of all the nations of the world, both in times of peace and in war, without discrimination to those nations, then we will have complied with the general principles of neutralization as established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

At this time I would pause long enough to recall to your minds the different conditions that obtained under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and in construing them it is but fair and just, in order to arrive at the proper interpretations, to take into consideration those conditions. Under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty private individuals or corporations were to construct the canal, and the canal in part was to be constructed through territory that England claimed some domain, sovereignty, or protectorate over, and the United States Government acknowledged that dominion. Under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the United States Government, at its own enormous expense and through its own territory, was to construct the canal and operate it.

England had no interest in the land affected, did not have to contribute one cent to the venture, did not have to incur a single obligation for its future maintenance. Then I submit under every reasonable rule of construction that if, in construing the Clayton-Bulwer treaty doubtful meaning should attach to any of its provisions, neither party should be given any advantage in its construction, but should be treated alike, and the burden of proof as to the correctness of the position of one who asserts a violation of its provisions would necessarily be upon that party who makes the assertion. [Applause.]

But in the interpretation of any of the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, in view of the fact that the Government of the United States acquired the territory through which to construct it, built it at its own expense, and has incurred and is incurring all the risk and expense of its operation, that where a provision in it is susceptible of two reasonable interpretations and there is doubt as to which is the correct one, that certainly, in view of all the circumstances, it should be most liberally construed in favor of the United States Government. If this position should not be taken, then certainly the proof of the assertion of a violation of the provision should be upon that party who makes the assertion. If either of these rules of construction or interpretation be accepted, Great Britain's contention must fall. On the first our Government necessarily wins, and on the second Great Britain as yet has not proven her assertion.

But we are asked to repeal the present law and reverse our former action because England says "that in exempting our own coastwise vessels from paying tolls when passing through the Panama Canal" we violate paragraph 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Now, let us analyze this article of the treaty. It says "that the United States adopts," among other things, "the following rules":

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

There is no doubt in my mind that in construing the Hay-Pauncefote treaty England's only desire was, since the United States Government was going to embark upon such a stupendous adventure, incurring such enormous expense and accepting such apparent risks, that all nations whose commerce or war vessels sailed through the Panama Canal should be treated equally and alike, and that no nation should be discriminated against. I can not for the life of me see how any reasonable man could contend that the United States, after expending $400,000,000 in a very uncertain undertaking, should be asked to operate it at an expense of many more millions a year without allowing her own war vessels or vessels of commerce floating her flag and engaged exclusively in coastwise trade to go through without paying tolls. [Applause.]

I want here to call attention of the committee to the fact that if we are prevented by this article from exempting our own coastwise vessels from payment of tolls, we have no right to exempt our own battleships, cruisers, and so forth, from payment of tolls.

In this paragraph you will note—

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations.

Of course, I can not subscribe to the proposition that we must, if England says that we should, charge our own war vessels toll to go through the canal, because I can not subscribe to the proposition that under the treaty we have not the right to exempt our own vessels engaged in coastwise trade going through the canal from the payment of tolls, as well as exempt our war vessels. Both propositions stand upon the same footing. If it be conceded that our war vessels can be exempted from the payment of tolls, then it must necessarily follow that vessels of commerce engaged in coastwise trade through the canal can be exempted from tolls. I think that the intention of the framers of the treaty in writing the treaty may be stated in this way: That the United States Government shall guarantee that the canal shall be open to commerce both in war and in peace to all nations of the world, and that the charges which the United States shall place on vessels of all nations shall be just and equitable; that no discrimination shall be shown any foreign nation with respect to traffic charges or otherwise. [Applause.]

If England is correct in this assertion, then why should she not, with as equal force, contend that we have no right to exempt our war vessels through the canal from payment of toll? There is no distinction in the paragraph or treaty between war vessels and merchant vessels. If we have no authority under the provisions of this treaty to give preference to our merchant marine, then we have no authority to give preference to our war vessels. And if you follow the argument to its logical conclusion—I might say that if this treaty applies to our war vessels and we should get in war with a foreign country, then England might prevent us from keeping our war vessels anywhere within 3 miles of either end of the canal for more than 24 hours, except in case of distress. The same treaty, by paragraph 5, article 3, says that the United States shall adopt the following additional rule:

> The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

If under paragraph 1, article 3, the United States might be prevented by England from exempting our coastwise vessels from payment of toll, then why could it not be as forcibly contended by England that under paragraph 5 of article 3, in case of war between our country and some foreign country, that we could not keep our war vessels within 3 miles of the canal for more than 24 hours at a time? One is as logical as the other. They are both illogical. [Applause.]

Surely, Mr. Chairman, this Government has the right under the treaty to make rules and regulations concerning the canal, and has the right to charge its coastwise vessels going through the canal a larger or a smaller toll than it does foreign vessels, if it likes; exempt them and its own vessels altogether, if it chooses. The only check on this Government in the matter of toll charges is that the same charge shall be fixed and the same regulations enforced on all foreign vessels. [Applause.]

The committee in charge of this bill know that the American people will not stand for the proposition that, after spending $400,000,000 of their money and constantly spending more in constructing and operating this canal, we are to charge our own Government toll for our own war vessels to go through the canal. They know that the proposition is wrong and that the American people will not accept it, and yet when in the same paragraph of the same treaty that England attacks—"that the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations"—we say that we have the same right to deal with our coastwise vessels that we have with our war vessels, those who would align themselves with England dissent from that view.

If we acknowledge England's right to say to us under the treaty that we have no right to exempt our own coastwise vessels from payment of tolls through the canal, then we might surrender all the benefits given to American vessels of war and commerce at the canal and our right to regulate the canal in many other ways that might arise. [Applause.] The rule of equity is not limited to canal tolls, but relates to our discrimination in respect to charges or conditions of traffic or otherwise; the question of charging tolls to our own coastwise vessels is a domestic matter. It is a question that England has not and should not have any interest or voice in. England, nor any foreign country, can engage in coastwise trade in this country. This has been the law since 1817. Then how could the question of no toll charges on coastwise vessels in this country be a discrimination against foreign vessels when they are charged a toll? But aside from the fact that no reason attaches to England's contention in this matter, as evidenced by the plain wording of the treaty, I want to quote briefly from those who were instrumental in framing this treaty and in ratifying it.

The correspondence between the United States and Great Britain leading up to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty throws much light on the subject. Rule 1 of the treaty received the most serious consideration in the diplomatic negotiations preceding the adoption of the treaty, and that correspondence reveals the fact that England's solicitude was only to secure for herself equal treatment with other nations. This appears from Lord Lansdowne's communication to Lord Pauncefote on October 23, 1901, on this subject, in which he said, in part:

I informed the United States chargé d'affaires to-day that His Majesty's Government had given their careful attention to the various amendments which have been suggested in the draft of the interoceanic canal treaty, communicated by Mr. Hay to your lordship on the 25th of April last, and that I was now in a position to inform him officially of our views.

Mr. Hay suggested that in Article III, rule 1, we should substitute for the words "the canal shall be free and open to vessels of commerce and of war of all nations which shall agree to observe these rules, etc.," the words "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules," and in the same clause, as a consequence of the amendment, substitute for the words "any nation so agreeing" the words "any such nation." His Majesty's Government were prepared to accept this amendment, which seemed to us equally efficacious for the purpose which we had in view, namely, that of insuring that Great Britain should not be placed in a less advantageous position than any other power, while they stopped short of conferring upon other nations a contractual right to the use of the canal.

The only reasonable inference to be drawn from the language of this English negotiator is that he was seeking to obtain the most-favored-nation clause for Great Britain and nothing more.

The letter of Hon. A. Mitchell Innes, chargé d'affaires, written to the Secretary of State, Mr. Knox, on July 8, 1912, practically admits our right under the treaty. In concluding his letter he says:

If the trade could be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic, which is reserved for United States vessels, would be benefited by the exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken.

Does that sound like a violation of the treaty?

I desire, Mr. Chairman, at this point of my remarks to incorporate the utterances of many Senators who engaged in the debates ratifying the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and whose views are worthy of consideration as to what construction and interpretation were then given by the Senate to the provisions of the treaty.

Mr. LODGE, Senator from Massachusetts, who was chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Senate, and who reported the treaty to the Senate, said:

When I reported that treaty my own impression was that it left the United States in complete control of the tolls upon its own vessels. I did not suppose then that there was any limitation put upon our right to charge such tolls as we pleased upon our own vessels, or that we were included in the phrase "all nations."

Hon. Thomas R. Bard, ex-Senator from California, said:

When my amendment was under consideration it was generally conceded by Senators that even without that specific provision the rules of the treaty would not prevent our Government from treating the canal as part of our coast line and consequently could not be construed as a restriction of our interstate commerce, forbidding the discrimination in charges for tolls in favor of our coastwise trade, and this conviction contributed to the defeat of the amendment.

Hon. Charles A. Towne, ex-Senator from Minnesota, said:

I remember distinctly my own feeling about the matter at the time, which was that we retained under the treaty full sovereignty over the canal and over the incidents of its ownership and control, including the right to fortify and police it and to regulate its use by vessels of commerce, subject only to the condition that all other nations should be treated alike; and that this was the general understanding.

Hon. Marion Butler, ex-Senator from North Carolina, said:

I can not agree with the position of those who contend that the "free-tolls" law is in violation of the spirit or the letter of the treaty. I remember that when the first section of the third article of the treaty was under consideration, which provides that the canal shall be open to the vessels of all nations on the same terms, that several Senators suggested the propriety of adding a provision expressly exempting our domestic commerce done through coastwise vessels.

The prompt response to this proposition on the part of the Senators having the treaty in charge was that such an amendment was unnecessary, because the treaty was so understood by the contracting parties.

Hon. George Turner, ex-Senator from Washington, said:

My recollection of the view taken in the Senate at the time of the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is substantially similar to that of Senators Lodge, Bard, Clapp, Perkins, Davis, and others. I am certain the treaty would not have been ratified if there had been doubt in the mind of anybody that the treaty limited the United States in the use which it might make of its own canal for its own purposes. The fact that the canal was to be the exclusive property of the United States, and under its absolute control for all purposes of war and peace, subject, of course, to fair dealing as between all other nations, was the controlling factor in the ratification of the treaty. Of this there can be no doubt.

From the views of these men and the correspondence showing the negotiations preceding the adoption of the treaty and the wording of the treaty, it seems to me clearly established that we have a right, if we desire to exercise it, of exempting our vessels engaged in coastwise trade from payment of tolls through the canal.

This view is shared by many distinguished lawyers, as well as many reputable international law journals, in other countries.

The question involved in this discussion has been settled by our Supreme Court.

It is rather interesting that in the provisions of the treaty between this country and England, made in 1815 and which has never been repealed, England should have seen fit for nearly 100 years to violate, and yet under its provisions and operations give occasion to settle the very question that she now complains about.

The treaty of 1815 provides—

That no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed * * * in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

And yet, notwithstanding the above provision in that treaty, England discriminates against our vessels, as shown by the following:

Tonnage dues at the port of London are as follows: (1) For every vessel trading coastwise or entering inward or clearing outward from or to any place north of latitude 48° 30′ N., and between longitude 12° W. and 65° E. of Greenwich, for every voyage, both in and out, 1d. per ton. (2) For every vessel entering inward or clearing outward beyond those limits, 1½d. per ton. (3) For vessels under 100 tons which do not pass beyond the seaward limit of the port, a halfpenny per ton. (4) Coastwise vessels not exceeding 45 tons, vessels bringing corn coastwise, fishing smacks, and lobster and oyster boats are exempt from dues.

This discrimination of 1 cent a ton for entering and clearing port in favor of coastwise vessels and against trans-Atlantic vessels may on first impression seem trifling, but when on calculation it is found that on a vessel of 5,000 tons this additional 1 cent per ton on entering and leaving port amounts to $50 it is evident that all sense of equality between ocean-going vessels and those employed in the home trade only is completely discarded.

If England for a moment believed that the words "British vessels" or "vessels of the United States," as used in the treaty of 1815, included or was ever intended to include coasting vessels, she would not have established and enforced differential rates at her various ports in favor of coasting vessels, for that would then be a flagrant violation of the rights secured to vessels of the United States under the treaty. Not only this, but such an interpretation on the part of England would afford the United States to justly demand that vessels of the United States pay the same dues and charges at British ports as are exacted from British vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, instead of those largely increased and heavier dues and charges that American vessels have to pay.

But, in addition to this, Great Britain, by assent and ratification under circumstances similar to those that have arisen under the Panama Canal act, is not in a position to now insist on an interpretation of the equality clause of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty different from that in accordance with the established interpretation she herself has put upon the treaty of 1815 and of like clauses in other treaties.

No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States, nor in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

It will be seen that the provision above quoted from the treaty of 1815 is as broad and comprehensive as the equality clause contained in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and that it embraces all vessels of either country, without excepting the United States or making any distinction.

Hon. A. C. Hereshoff, a very distinguished international lawyer, in speaking of this, says:

If, therefore, the expressions "British vessels" and "vessels of the United States" do not embrace vessels employed in the coastwise trade as England has herself interpreted the words for nearly a century, it is incomprehensible that she should now pretend in an outburst of indignation that the words "vessels of commerce of all nations" contained in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty does refer to and include those very vessels that she has always excluded under the terms "British vessels" and "vessels of the United States."

The question arose under the provision of this treaty whether or not coastwise vessels should be classed with foreign vessels. This is the case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S. Repts., 332), and is founded on the following facts: The duly State-licensed pilots of Galveston, Tex., brought suit for damages against certain unlicensed pilots for piloting in that port and prayed for an injunction restraining them from operating without a license and in violation of the State laws concerning pilotage.

These State laws provided for a rate to be paid for licensed pilotage by vessels engaged in foreign trade, but exempted those engaged in coastwise trade in any part of the United States.

The United States laws also exempted coastwise vessels from the operation of pilotage laws. See section 1444, Revised Statutes.

The defendants contended that "as the vessel in question was a British vessel coming from a foreign port the State laws concerning pilotage were in conflict with the treaty of 1815," and so forth, providing—

That no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any port of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States.

Ruling on this contention that the exemption of vessels engaged in coastwise trade was a discrimination, violative of the treaty of 1815, the court, in speaking through the present Chief Justice White, said:

Nor is there merit in the contention that as the vessel in question was a British vessel coming from a foreign port the State laws concerning pilotage are in conflict with a treaty between Great Britain and the United States providing that no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States. Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage resulting from the law of the United States nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by State law concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemption does not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in such trade. In substance the proposition but asserts that because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations, therefore there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even although such regulations apply without discrimination to all vessels in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign. (Olsen v. Smith, 195 U. S., 344.)

This decision was handed down in 1904, and the fact that England has acquiesced in it and has practiced for generations a like rule with respect to her coastwise vessels is quite sufficient to convince me that her position in this discussion is illogical and untenable. [Applause.]

THE ECONOMICAL QUESTION.

I have discussed the question as it affects our treaty relations. I now desire to address myself to the subject from an economic standpoint. I am a believer in cheap transportation. We have recently passed a good-roads bill because we thought it would insure cheaper transportation to the farmers of the country. We recently passed a law insuring the construction of a railroad in Alaska. The purpose of that legislation was to give cheaper and quicker transportation to the people there and to the Government in opening up its rich resources. We have just passed a rivers and harbors bill that carries over $40,000,000 to open up our natural waterways and insure for the people cheaper water transportation. [Applause.]

I believe that the industrial life and prosperity of a people is measured by the opportunities offered them in convenient and cheap transportation facilities, whether those facilities be highways, railways, or waterways. [Applause.]

May I ask what was the primary cause for constructing the Panama Canal?

Why, to ask the question is but to answer it. We thought we would give quicker and cheaper transportation facilities not only to the people along our Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts in trading with each other, but that it would bring all the peoples of the world in closer commercial relations. [Applause.]

The most plausible and convincing and, I might say, controlling arguments advanced in the discussions in Congress over the construction of the canal was that it would bring about competition between the steamship lines and the transcontinental railroads in the matter of freight rates, and that the people would get the benefit of those rates.

The object of this Government from the beginning of its policy of appropriating money for river and harbor work has been to create waterways, thereby helping navigation, giving the people facilities for quicker and cheaper transportation, and incidentally aiding our merchant marine. [Applause.]

But at no time in the history of the Government have we exacted a toll or tariff from any of our vessels for using the waterways of this country.

On the Mississippi, Ohio, and Missouri Rivers this Government has spent over $150,000,000, and I wonder if any Member of this House would have the audacity to-day to advocate charging our vessels that ply the waters of these rivers a toll. I think not. I wonder if there is any Member present who would advocate charging a toll on our vessels that enter the harbors on our coasts or the smaller rivers in this country that the Government is appropriating money for. I think not. And yet the proposition is the same. The Panama Canal is exclusively in our territory; it belongs to us, the same as the Soo Canal that connects the Great Lakes to our north. There is just as much reason for charging our vessels that ply the waters of the Mississippi, Ohio, Missouri, the Tennessee, or the smallest navigable river in this country, or through any of the harbors of this country, made and maintained at the Government's expense, or through the Soo Canal, as to charge our coastwise vessels a toll for going through the Panama Canal.

What difference is there in loading a vessel at Galveston of a certain capacity and allowing it to sail out of that harbor, around the Florida coast, and into the port of New York, without exacting toll charges, and in loading the same vessel with the same kind of products, of the same capacity, the following month, to be carried through the Panama Canal to San Francisco, and exacting on that cargo a toll that will necessarily come out of the pockets of the people in being compelled to pay higher freight charges? [Applause.]

If you establish the principle of charging toll on American coastwise vessels through the Panama Canal, you set a precedent that may be established at any time in the future to charge toll on American coastwise vessels that ply any of the harbors or waters or streams of this country that are maintained at the Federal Government's expense. [Applause.]

It has been asserted by those who align themselves with the English view that if we exempt our coastwise vessels we grant them a subsidy. Ah, sirs, be not deceived; that argument does not fool any man who can think.

If there is any subsidy, the transcontinental railroads of this country and Canada will get the subsidy. Let me illustrate. Let us suppose that a trainload of fertilizers, cotton, and other products were sold by the people of one of the towns in my State, say, Hattiesburg, to buyers in San Francisco. Ordinarily these products would be shipped by rail. Let us imagine the shipment to be 10,000 tons. If these products in being shipped to San Francisco through the canal via rail to Mobile, Gulfport, or New Orleans, thence by steamers through the Panama Canal, had to suffer the payment of $1.20 per ton toll, then necessarily the transportation charges on these products would be $12,000 more than it would be if they could go through the canal free of toll. [Applause.]

You know, Mr. Chairman, and the gentlemen of this committee know, that if this $12,000 additional charge for transportation is imposed on these products when shipped through the Panama Canal that the railroads can compete with them to the extent that they will exact more and higher charges from the people. [Applause.]

You know that the lower the toll incurred on freight in being transported through the canal the less freight charges will be exacted by the transcontinental railroads of the country. [Applause.] In order to do business they must compete, and in order to compete they must reduce their freight charges. It has been asserted that even though free tolls for coastwise vessels going through the canal might give cheaper transportation to people living along or near the Gulf, Atlantic, and Pacific coasts, that it would not affect the people living higher up in the Mississippi Valley and in the State far away from the coasts. That argument is fallacious. Under the present law, as a general rule, no railroad is allowed to charge lower rates from far-distant points than are charged to intermediate points. In other words, the Interstate Commerce Commission would not permit a railroad to charge less for transporting freight from New York to San Francisco than it would from New York to St. Louis or Denver.

Free tolls to American coastwise vessels will aid the farmers and manufacturers of the Mississippi Valley to ship their products down the Mississippi, through the canal, and thence to the Pacific seacoast at cheaper rates than now are charged by the railroads operating between those sections. It would probably open up another market on the Pacific coast, where there are natural manufacturing advantages, to the cotton farmers of Mississippi and other Southern States and allow them an opportunity to transport their cotton and other products to that section at cheap rates, where now the rates are prohibitive. [Applause.]

I believe that free tolls for our coastwise vessels through the canal will work as a regulator of freight rates throughout the country. [Applause.]

If we are to profit from the Panama Canal, as we have always believed and expected, we can not and must not use it to obstruct and impair free commerce between our own sections. No tollgate should ever be used in the path of our own interstate trade. Let us not now in this age of enlightenment and advanced civilization resurrect that disused, repudiated, and ancient method of charging our own citizens for passage. My section once was dotted with toll bridges, and some tollgates, but long since the people realized the injustice and hardship imposed by such institutions, and now no tollgates and only occasionally a toll bridge can be found there. [Applause.]

But, Mr. Chairman, if, as an economic question, I did not believe in exempting our own coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls under the circumstances I would be compelled to vote against the repeal of the law.

Here is a law that England claims is in conflict with the provisions of the treaty, and for that reason ought to be repealed. The issue is squarely presented. If you acquiesce in England's request, if you vote for this repeal law, you say first to England, "We have been mistaken; you were right," and you, sirs, by your action forever estop this Government from again asserting the right to exempt our own coastwise vessels through the canal from the payment of tolls. Who of you will hereafter have the nerve to introduce a bill exempting our vessels engaged in coastwise trade from the payment of tolls? Why, you know what England would say. She would say, "You are foolish. You passed such a law once and we protested; and, although three Presidents declared we were wrong and you were right, and although both Houses of Congress, by substantial majorities, said we were wrong and you were right, and although the platform of the Democratic Party said we were wrong and you were right, and although the great majority of the people of your country thought we were wrong and you were right, you changed your former opinions, you reversed yourself, your committee in the House of Representatives defended our position and contended for our contentions and upheld our view by reporting out a bill repealing all you had formerly said and done, and it passed both Houses of Congress and was then signed by your own President. The question has been settled, and you are forever estopped from complaining again." [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DOREMUS. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. HARRISON. Ah, sirs, not only that, but if England can say to-day to us that we have no right in the legislation of our own domestic affairs; to say what we may or shall do with respect to charging or exempting our own coastwise vessels from payment of tolls through the canal, then they may insist—and if you adopt this act, reasonably so—that many other things shall be done or shall not be done with respect to the regulation and control of the Panama Canal. [Applause.] Have we spent $400,000,000 in vain? Are we to receive no benefits from it? Did we inaugurate such a wonderful work—the most wonderful piece of engineering of all times—assume the risk, spend the people's money, achieve success in the undertaking, merely now to surrender our control over it and rights in it? [Applause.]

Be not deceived, sirs; those of you who would vote for this repeal act will some day have that act rise to plague you.

This Nation fought valiantly and paid dearly for its independence. Since that time we have grown enormously and prospered immeasurably. We have by our stand for humanity and the right, in defending at all times our national honor and integrity, won the respect of all nations. Are we now to bow in humble humility to Great Britain, simply because it, as a powerful nation, thinks that we, now situated as we are, confronted by international complications, would surrender honor to an unjust and unreasonable contention for the sordid consideration of assisting us to settle a question that, although it is close to us, yet, after all, is in the interest of humanity? [Applause.]

For my part, sirs, as much as I admire our distinguished President, as much as I want to be with him in all his policies, I can not reconcile my conscience to his view and surrender to Great Britain what to me seems to be a principle of national honor and integrity. [Applause.] I prefer to vote my convictions, follow the platform of my party, and stand up for the integrity and honor of my Government. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, unless the gentleman from California [Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND] desires to use some time, I shall ask the Chair to recognize the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS].

The SPEAKER. For how long?

Mr. ADAMSON. The Chair may recognize him for 30 minutes, and if I do not hold up my hand at that time he can permit him to go on until I do.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for 30 minutes, and then some. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, the progress of this debate well illustrates the wisdom of the Republican delegates at the Chicago convention, in 1912, in not attempting to insert in our Republican platform anything which concerned the legislative policies of this country, however important they may be, about which there had not been previous careful and sincere investigation and discussion among the people. We Republicans are fortunate in not being burdened by any declaration in our platform, and on this measure can debate upon the high plane of entire sincerity and entire friendliness with our associates who may differ with us.

VIEWPOINTS.

It is important in discussing all great questions to ascertain at the outset two things: First, what is the fundamental controversy and what are the different viewpoints of the contending parties? And, secondly, what are the real facts and all of them which bear upon the problem? An illustration of the importance of defining the real controversy was furnished by the last distinguished speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. He stated to you, in substance, that the question was whether the United States should have the right to grant free tolls through the Panama Canal. That is not the question at all. I do not presume there is one man in the United States, who has given any thought to this matter, but who believes and knows that this Congress can pass our national ships through the canal either free of tolls or with any sort of toll which we may see fit to require. That can not be fairly contradicted. The real controversy is whether the policy we may adopt as to the vessels under our flag, should also be applied to the same classes of the ships and traffic of other nations who also desire to use that canal. That is the real question—what is our duty, not in the treatment of our own vessels, but in the treatment of the same kind of the ships and traffic of other nations?

FUNDAMENTAL DIFFERENCES.

It seems to me, that the difference in the discussion between the two sides of this question is fundamental in this particular. Those of us who contend for equal tolls without discrimination as to any nation, believe that the principal basis in the settlement of this question should be international, and that domestic considerations should be secondary. Those who differ with us believe that domestic considerations should be primary and that international questions should be secondary.

DIVISIONS OF QUESTION.

Thus there naturally arise three different divisions in the discussion of this great question: First, what are the international aspects which must be considered? Secondly, what are our international obligations in the way of treaties and how should they be interpreted? And, thirdly, what are the economic aspects of the situation, with regard to both sides of this controversy?

Two years ago in discussing this same matter I elaborated upon the interpretation of the treaties as I conceived it should be. That is a matter of record, and to-day I shall not attempt to pursue that subject. My views then were expressed. I see no reason at all to change them, but I will take advantage of the order of the House and place in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a concise statement as to how, to my mind, these treaties should be interpreted. So that I shall confine myself as best I can to discuss, first, the international aspects of the question, and, secondly, some of the economic phases of it.

PANAMA GEOGRAPHY.

The geography of the world clearly shows its international importance. The Panama Canal is a strait connecting the two greatest oceans of the world. Upon these oceans face practically every great civilized and commercial nation of the world. Upon these oceans has been and will be carried the great mass of the water-borne commerce of the world. Upon these oceans, as we do, face nine nations, with more or less commerce between their coasts. Upon these oceans front the mother and the colonial possessions of the most important nations in the world, and upon these oceans and passing through that canal will be an increasing intercourse which will change, more or less—probably more, as the years go on—the destiny, political, commercial, and social, of all of these great peoples and countries. We must realize, then, that all of these peoples and all interests of all nations are greatly interested in the management and operation of this canal. They are interested in their own right, and they have natural, God-given rights in this great connecting waterway, which must be considered by any just people to whom may be intrusted the task of administering it.

NATURAL RIGHTS.

I speak of natural rights in connection with the use of this canal with reason and advertently, because our country from the beginning of its history has insisted on the natural rights of our people and of our commerce in the use of every connecting waterway in the world, wherever it has seemed necessary for our people or commerce to properly go. From the beginning of our Government, since the time when John Jay asserted that right on behalf of this country in the British treaty, I think of 1794, and President Jefferson sent our heroic little Navy against the Barbary pirates to assert the right of a free and open sea with equality of treatment, down through the discussion with Denmark as to the right to levy sound dues at the entrance of the Baltic, the discussion as to natural and international rights in the Straits of Magellan and the rights of the nations in the Pacific, north and south everywhere, every administration of every political party has insisted that American citizens and American commerce should have equal rights with every other nation everywhere and at all times. That has been the true American policy, the historic policy of our country. [Applause.]

The International Parliamentary Union has collected and published a very elaborate document upon the subject of international rights in maritime canals, and here it is. It contains a list of about 40 great straits and connecting waterways and canals in the world, in which there are natural rights of an international character.

In many of these the United States has asserted its right of equal treatment; and wherever any question has arisen, our Government has insisted upon its right of equal treatment for its commerce and its citizens in every one of those waterways. The first time there has been any departure by our country from this invariable rule as to equal treatment in the use of any of this class of waterways, was the enactment of this Panama bill of two years ago. I will insert this list in the RECORD, so the Members of the House can realize that this question can not be confined as we may wish or decide in this one measure, but that it will ramify everywhere, all over the globe, as to all of our commerce and intercourse, now and hereafter.

The governmental action of the United States in requiring equality of treatment for its citizens and commerce under all circumstances and at all times, is fully described in the monumental work of Prof. John Bassett Moore—Digest of International Law, volume 1, pages 658–668; volume 2, pages 22–23; also Proceedings of the Society of International Law, April 24, 1913, pages 30–40.

Lord Salisbury described the Suez Canal "a natural right of passage for the commerce of the world"; and his great rival, Gladstone, added:

We can not undertake to do any act inconsistent with the acknowledgment, indubitable and sacred in our eyes, that the canal has been made for the benefit of all nations at large, and that the rights connected with it are matters of common European interest.

This great influence of the United States for an open and an equal sea began when it was only a little fringe of States, with a feeble Navy and almost no Treasury, and it has continued with the approval of all of our people throughout all administrations of all parties. To-day, when the population and resources of this Nation of 100,000,000 people has enabled it to construct with glory the greatest work known to man, it is now proposed to reverse the policy which always has been both the profit and pride of our people. When this reversal is really understood it will not be permitted by a just and generous nation.

TRANSOCEANIC WATERWAYS.

In all negotiations in the history of the transoceanic waterways between the Atlantic and Pacific, likewise, there has been practically a uniform policy from that day in 1826 when Henry Clay first officially, for this Government, gave attention to a transoceanic canal, down through every administration of every political party. In almost every document and declaration, have our fathers laid down the almost invariable policy for equal treatment of all Governments, of all citizens, and of all commerce. I will place those facts in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

Mr. Clay, Secretary of State, to Messrs. Anderson and Sergeant, United States representatives to the Panama congress, May 8, 1826:

A cut or a canal for purposes of navigation somewhere through the Isthmus that connects the two Americas to unite the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans will form a proper subject of consideration at the congress. That vast object, if it should be ever accomplished, will be interesting in a greater or less degree to all parts of the world. But to this continent will probably accrue the largest amount of benefit from its execution, and to Colombia, Mexico, the Central Republic, Peru, and the United States more than to any other of the American nations. What is to redound to the advantage of all America should be effected by common means and united exertions and should not be left to the separate and unassisted efforts of any one power. * * * If the work should ever be executed so as to admit of the passage of sea vessels from ocean to ocean, the benefits of it ought not to be exclusively appropriated to any one nation, but should be extended to all parts of the globe upon the payment of a just compensation or reasonable tolls.

Senate resolution, 1835:

* * * The construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and of securing forever by such stipulations the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all such nations. * * *

House resolution, 1839:

* * * For the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of effecting a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus and of securing forever, by suitable treaty stipulations, the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all nations.

Treaty of 1846:

* * * Any modes of communication that now exist, or that may be hereafter constructed, shall be open and free to the Government and citizens of the United States, and for the transportation of any articles of produce, manufactures, or merchandise of lawful commerce belonging to the citizens of the United States; that no other tolls or charges shall be levied or collected upon the citizens of the United States, or their said merchandise thus passing over any road or canal that may be made by the Government of New Granada, or by the authority of the same, than is, under like circumstances, levied upon and collected from the Granadian citizens. * * *

President Polk's message:

It will constitute no alliance for any political object, but for a purely commercial purpose in which all the navigating nations of the world have a common interest.

In entering into mutual guaranties proposed by the thirty-fifth article of the treaty, neither the Government of New Granada nor that of the United States has any narrow or exclusive views. The ultimate object, as presented by the Senate of the United States in their resolution of March 3, 1835, to which I have already referred, is to secure to all nations the free and equal right of passage over the Isthmus.

Secretary of State Lewis Cass:

While the rights of sovereignty of the local governments must always be respected, other rights also have arisen in the progress of events involving interests of great magnitude to the commercial world, and demanding its careful attention and, if need be, its efficient protection. In view of these interests and after having invited capital and enterprise from other countries to aid in the opening in these great highways of nations under pledges of free transit to all desiring it, it can not be permitted that these Governments should exercise over them an arbitrary and unlimited control, or close them or embarrass them without reference to the wants of commerce or the intercourse of the world. Equally disastrous would it be to leave them at the mercy of every nation which, in time of war, might find it advantageous for hostile purposes to take possession of them and either restrain their use or suspend it altogether.

The President hopes that by the general consent of the maritime powers all such difficulties may be prevented, and the interoceanic lines, with the harbors of immediate approach to them, may be secured beyond interruption to the great purposes for which they were established.

See Seward in note to Minister Adams, 1862:

This Government has no interest in the matter different from that of other maritime powers. It is willing to interpose its aid in execution of its treaty and for the equal benefit of all nations.

In a note to the Colombian minister, January 18, 1869, Secretary Seward expressed himself in the same manner.

Negotiations of Secretary of State Fish:

* * * A Darien Canal should not be regarded as hostile to a Suez Canal; they will be not so much rivals as joint contributors to the increase of the commerce of the world, and thus mutually advance each other's interests. * * *

We shall * * * be glad of any movement which shall result in the early decision of the question of the most practicable route and the early commencement and speedy completion of an interoceanic communication, which shall be guaranteed in its perpetual neutralization and dedication to the commerce of all nations, without advantages to one over another of those who guarantee its assured neutrality. * * *

* * * the benefit of neutral waters at the ends thereof for all classes of vessels entitled to fly their respective flags, with the cargoes on board, on equal terms in every respect as between each other. * * *

Secretary of State Blaine's instructions to Mr. Lowell:

* * * Nor does the United States seek any exclusive or narrow commercial advantage. It frankly agrees, and will by public proclamation declare at the proper time, in conjunction with the Republic on whose soil the canal may be located, that the same rights and privileges, the same tolls and obligations for the use of the canal, shall apply with absolute impartiality to the merchant marine of every nation on the globe; and equally in time of peace the harmless use of the canal shall be freely granted to the war vessels of other nations. * * *

Lord Granville's reply:

* * * such communication concerned not merely the United States or the American Continent, but, as was recognized by article 6 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the whole civilized world, and that she would not oppose or decline any discussion for the purpose of securing on a general international basis its universal and unrestricted use; * * *

President Cleveland's message, 1885:

* * * Whatever highway may be constructed across the barrier dividing the two greatest maritime areas of the world must be for the world's benefit—a trust for mankind, to be removed from the chance of domination by any single power, nor become a point of invitation for hostilities or a prize for warlike ambition. * * *

* * * These suggestions may serve to emphasize what I have already said on the score of the necessity of a neutralization of any interoceanic transit; and this can only be accomplished by making the uses of the route open to all nations and subject to the ambitions and warlike necessities of none.

Secretary of State Olney's memorandum, 1896:

* * * That the interoceanic routes there specified should, under the sovereignty of the States traversed by them, be neutral and free to all nations alike. * * *

* * * Under these circumstances, upon every principle which governs the relations to each other, either by nations or of individuals, the United States is completely estopped from denying that the treaty is in full force and vigor.

Message of President Roosevelt in submitting treaty:

* * * It specifically provides that the United States alone shall do the work of building and assume the responsibility of safeguarding the canal, and shall regulate its neutral use by all nations on terms of equality without the guaranty of interference of any outside nation from any quarter. * * *

President Roosevelt's special message, January 4, 1904:

* * * Under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty it was explicitly provided that the United States should control, police, and protect the canal which was to be built, keeping it open for the vessels of all nations on equal terms. The United States thus assumes the position of guarantor of the canal and of its peaceful use by all the world.

Secretary of State Hay's note of January 5, 1904:

* * * The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was conceived to form an obstacle, and the British Government therefore agreed to abrogate it, the United States only promising in return to protect the canal and keep it open on equal terms to all nations in accordance with our traditional policy. * * *

CANAL ZONE.

The very basis for the acquisition by our Government of the Canal Zone, and the acquiescence of the nations in such action, was that it was an act of international eminent domain for the welfare of the world, and the equal benefit of the commerce of all nations, and not for our national and selfish purposes.

That was the pledge given to the world at the time of our action, and as contained in the diplomatic documents of our Government relating to that stirring episode. The other nations took us at our word, believed in our integrity and pledges, and recognized and adopted our action.

By the discriminating tolls act of two years ago, we repudiate the very basis for our proceedings in our treatment of Colombia and Panama. Instead of an act of international eminent domain for the equal benefit of the world's commerce, we now insist that "might makes right," and selfish citizens of ours, under the plea that it is an "American policy," shall be permitted to utilize for their own profit, the generous forbearance and confidence of the other nations in the integrity and honor of the United States. No wonder President Wilson is finding it difficult to treat with the representatives of these powers, on a basis of sincerity and fair-mindedness.

REPORT OF SENATOR DAVIS.

The one document in which these facts are best set forth, is the report of Senator Cushman K. Davis, of Minnesota, the chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, presenting to the Senate the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and I commend the reading of that remarkable report to everyone who is interested in a proper understanding and solution of this great question. If the time shall come, when it will be necessary for our Government to contend before an international tribunal, concerning our rights and obligations and duties under these isthmian treaties, this report of Senator Davis will be the best evidence and almost conclusive evidence that by the terms of them, the United States is bound to give equal rights to all nations and to all commerce and all citizens, in the use of this transisthmian waterway. [Applause.]

SENATOR DAVIS'S VIEWS.

There is a personal aspect to this discussion as to the views and attitude of Senator Davis, which I ask leave of the House to discuss and, I think, settle right here. It has been stated in debate here and elsewhere and in various reports, that Senator Davis believed the Hay-Pauncefote treaty allowed discrimination in favor of our coastwise commerce as against other nations. Various sincere and honorable gentlemen have stated from their recollection of his position, that such was his opinion. I had the pleasure of knowing Senator Davis very intimately and for many years, and my recollection is entirely to the contrary. I did not desire to rest on my own memory, so I have reenforced it by consulting those who were most intimate with him, his business, personal and social associates, and their recollection in every respect agrees with my own. But, of course, this is merely a difference of opinion and recollection among equally sincere and honest men, as to a matter which occurred several years ago, so frequently found in the experience of all of us. But fortunately there are records which lift the difference out of the realm of mere recollection, and settle it by what Senator Davis in his own writings, and in his own record, has stated what he actually did believe. I here exhibit to the House an original copy of his report, the last one obtainable, and I will insert in the RECORD all the paragraphs relating to treatment of commerce in the use of the canal. I know you will agree with me from them, that he believed that this waterway should be constructed and operated on terms of treatment of entire equality of the citizens and commerce of all nations.

[Extracts from the report of Senator Davis, of Minnesota, from the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, recommending the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.]

That the United States sought no exclusive privilege or preferential right of any kind in regard to the proposed communication, and their sincere wish, if it should be found practical, was to see it dedicated to the common use of all nations on the most liberal terms and a footing of perfect equality for all.

That the United States would not if they could obtain any exclusive right or privilege in a great highway which naturally belongs to all mankind.

That while they aim at no exclusive privilege for themselves, they could never consent to see so important a communication fall under the exclusive control of any other great commercial power.

If, however, the British Government shall reject these overtures on our part, and shall refuse to cooperate with us in the generous and philanthropic scheme of rendering the interoceanic communication by the way of the port and river San Juan free to all nations upon the same terms, we shall deem ourselves justified in protecting our interest independently of aid and despite of her opposition or hostility.

It was an explicit and peremptory demand for an agreement that would give to Nicaragua the freedom of exit to the sea through the San Juan River for a ship canal that should be open to all nations on equal terms and protected by an agreement of perfect neutrality.

In the origin of our claim to the right of way for our people and our produce, armies, mails, and other property through the canal, we offer to dedicate the canal to the equal use of mankind.

As to neutrality and the exclusive control of the canal and its dedication to universal use, the suggestions that were incorporated in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty came from the United States and were concurred in by Great Britain. In no instance has the Government of the United States intimated an objection to this treaty on account of the features of neutrality, its equal and impartial use by all other nations.

Thus the United States from the beginning, before the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, took the same ground that is reached in the convention of February, 1900, for the universal decree of the neutral, free, and innocent use of the canal as a worldly highway, where war should not exist and where the honor of all nations would be a safer protection than fortresses for its security. From that day to this these wise forecasts have been fulfilled, and Europe has adopted in the convention of Constantinople the same great safeguard for the canal that was projected by Mr. Cass in 1857.

No American statesman, speaking with official authority or responsibility, has ever intimated that the United States would attempt to control this canal for the exclusive benefit of our Government or people. They have all, with one accord, declared that the canal was to be neutral ground in time of war and always open on terms of impartial equity to the ships and commerce of the world.

Special treaties for the neutrality, impartiality, freedom, and innocent use of the two canals that are to be the eastern and western gateways of commerce between the two great oceans are not in keeping with the magnitude and universality of the blessings they must confer upon mankind. The subject rather belongs to the domain of international law.

The leading powers of Europe recognized the importance of this subject in respect of the Suez Canal, and ordained a public international act for its neutralization that is an honor to the civilization of the age. It is the beneficent work of all Europe and not of Great Britain alone. Whenever a canal is built in the Isthmus of Darien, it will be ultimately made subject to the same law of freedom and neutrality as governs the Suez Canal, as a part of the laws of nations, and no single power will be able to resist its control.

The European powers gave to this subject the greatest consideration, and reached conclusions that are not open to criticism as being unjust to any nation in the world. Turkey and Egypt, the imperial and the local sovereigns of the canal, and Great Britain, a controlling stockholder in the Maritime Canal Co., had special interests in the rules for regulating the use of the canal, and they united in the convention which deprived them of exceptional privileges in its navigation, in peace and in war, for the sake of justice to all maritime nations and the peace and prosperity of the world.

No nation disapproves of this great act or has had grounds of complaint against it. No American will ever be found to complain of it. It is right in its moral features, in its impartiality, and, above all, in its tendency to decrease the resort to war for the settlement of international quarrels, and will have the cordial approval of the American people.

The United States can not take an attitude of opposition to the principles of the great act of October 22, 1888, without discrediting the official declarations of our Government for 50 years on the neutrality of an isthmian canal and its equal use by all nations, without discrimination.

To set up the selfish motive of gain by establishing a monopoly of a highway that must derive its income from the patronage of all maritime countries would be unworthy of the United States if we owned the country through which the canal is to be built.

But the location of the canal belongs to other Governments, from whom we must obtain any right to construct a canal on their territory, and it is not unreasonable, if the question was new and was not involved in a subsisting treaty with Great Britain, that she should question the right of even Nicaragua and Costa Rica to grant to our ships of commerce and of war extraordinary privileges of transit through the canal.

It is not reasonable to suppose that Nicaragua and Costa Rica would grant to the United States the exclusive control of a canal through those States on terms less generous to the other maritime nations than those prescribed in the great act of October 22, 1888; or if we could compel them to give us such advantages over other nations it would not be creditable to our country to accept them.

That our Government or our people will furnish the money to build the canal presents the single question whether it is profitable to do so. If the canal, as property, is worth more than its cost we are not called on to divide the profits with other nations. If it is worth less, and we are compelled by national necessities to build the canal, we have no right to call on other nations to make up the loss to us. In any view, it is a venture that we will enter upon if it is to our interest, and if it is otherwise we will withdraw from its further consideration.

The Suez Canal makes no discrimination in its tolls in favor of its stockholders and, taking its profits or the half of them as our basis of calculation, we will never find it necessary to differentiate our rates of toll in favor of our own people in order to secure a very great profit on the investment.

In this convention we stipulate against the blockade of the canal by any nation.

In conditions that may not be entirely remote we would find this provision, in letting our ships through the canal free from capture by our enemy, of great security to our coastwise trade.

The Suez Canal is in the same situation, and none of the European powers would have it otherwise, because it is to the interest of all nations that war shall not exist in or near the canal, and it is made a national crime for any nation to violate the neutral ground. No nation is willing to incur universal hostility by violating the sanctity of waters in which all have equal rights.

But the canal is not dedicated to war but to peace, and whatever shall better secure just and honorable peace is a triumph.

In time of war as in time of peace the commerce of the world will pass through its portals in perfect security, enriching all nations, and we of the English-speaking people will either forget that this grand work has ever cost us a day of bitterness; or we will rejoice that our contentions have delayed our progress until the honor has fallen to our grand Republic to number this among our best works for the good of mankind.

ITALICIZED QUOTATIONS.

Now, secondly, in this report the Senator quoted at some length from the letter of the Secretary of State Clayton to Minister Rives, of France, in the framing of the first Clayton-Bulwer treaty. He evidently desired to emphasize what he considered the most important thoughts in the letter, and so has italicized and underscored, evidently with his own hand, what he desired should be especially kept in mind. I will read these paragraphs so you can judge exactly what Senator Davis believed to be of the greatest importance:

* * * That the United States sought no exclusive privilege or preferential right of any kind in regard to the proposed communication, and their sincere wish, if it should be found practicable, was to see it dedicated to the common use of all nations on the most liberal terms and a footing of perfect equality for all.

That the United States would not, if they could, obtain any exclusive right or privilege in a great highway which naturally belonged to all mankind.

That while they aimed at no exclusive privilege for themselves, they could never consent to see so important a communication fall under the exclusive control of any other great commercial power.

[Applause.]

You will note from these emphasized sentences that Senator Davis believed not only that we did not intend any discriminative treatment in the use of the canal, but he further believed it would be dishonorable to so do.

Now, third, Senator Davis——

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. COOPER. To what treaty was Senator Davis referring?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. To the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Mr. COOPER. The first——

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes. He died before the first one was considered.

Mr. COOPER. The Senate rejected the first one?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon. That treaty was ratified by the Senate with three amendments with which Great Britain refused to agree, but I will come to that a little later. As I stated, Senator Davis believed this waterway should not be fortified, for the reason it must be open on terms of entire equality without discrimination to anybody, and he believed that there should be no fortification. Now, I come to the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin. When Senator Davis considered this treaty, and his statement was he had given much consideration to it, he believed that it did not fully protect the rights of the United States, so he prepared what is known as the Davis amendment, as follows:

Your committee therefore report the following amendment to the pending treaty:

Insert, at the end of section 5 of article 2, the following:

"It is agreed, however, that none of the immediately foregoing conditions and stipulations in sections numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of this article shall apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing, by its own forces, the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order."

The very basis for this amendment, the very foundation for its consideration, was that these paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 did apply to and bind the United States, and because they did so apply and bind our Government, Senator Davis did not believe they should be construed to prevent the United States doing as it found necessary for its own defense. So he prepared this amendment, based on the contention that paragraph 1 did apply to the United States. Now, here is paragraph 1, which under this amendment did apply to the United States:

1. The canal shall be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise.

This obligation, then, applied to the United States, and under it "vessels of all nations" must be treated on terms of entire equality and there could be "no discrimination in favor of any nation, its citizens or its subjects, as to the charges or conditions of traffic, or otherwise." That amendment was based on the proposition admitted by everybody that the United States was one of those nations to which this section applied, under which it could not receive any discrimination and must be treated with "entire equality."

That amendment came before the Senate for a vote, and here is its result taken from page 11, Senate Document 85, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session:

Insert at the end of section 5 of article 2 the following:

"It is agreed, however, that none of the immediately foregoing conditions and stipulations in sections numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of this article shall apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order."

On the question to agree to the amendment it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 65, nays 17.

On motion by Mr. LODGE, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are: Messrs. Aldrich, Allen, Allison, Bacon, Baker, Bate, Berry, Burrows, Butler, Carter, Chandler, Clark of Wyoming, Clay, Cockrell, Culberson, Cullom, Daniel, Deboe, Depew, Dillingham, Dolliver, Elkins, Fairbanks, Foraker, Foster, Hale, Hanna, Harris, Hawley, Heitfeld, Hoar, Jones of Arkansas, Kean, Kenney, Kyle, Lodge, McBride, McComas, McLaurin, McMillan, Mallory, Martin of Virginia, Nelson, Penrose, Perkins, Pettigrew, Pettus, Platt of New York, Pritchard, Proctor, Quarles, Scott, Sewell, Shoup, Spooner, Sullivan, Taliaferro, Teller, Thurston, Towne, Turley, Turner, Vest, Warren, and Wetmore.

Those who voted in the negative are: Messrs. Bard, Beveridge, Frye, Gallinger, Hansbrough, Lindsay, McCumber, McEnery, Mason, Money, Morgan, Platt of Connecticut, Rawlins, Stewart, Tillman, Wellington, and Wolcott.

So the amendment was adopted.

Sixty-five Senators declared that the United States was one of "all nations," and could not have any discrimination, and this record can not be impeached as to its contents and the logical conclusion to be deduced from it.

SECOND TREATY.

But that is not all, Mr. Speaker. When the last Hay-Pauncefote treaty was before the Senate a somewhat similar question arose.

Senator Bacon, of Georgia, offered the following amendment:

In the preamble strike out all after the words "United States," in the tenth line, down to and including the word "convention," in line 11.

Strike out from article 2, in line 10, the following words: "Subject to the provisions of the present treaty."

Strike out all of articles 3 and 4.

You will recall that article 2 provides that the United States shall have the right to construct the canal at its own cost, have the rights incident to ownership, and so forth, "subject to the provisions of the present treaty." The limitations upon such ownership are contained in articles 3 and 4. So the matter was presented squarely as to whether the provisions as to commerce of the present treaty should obligate and should operate upon the United States. The Senate decided that the United States should be bound by the provisions of article 3, section 1, by the following vote set forth in Senate document No. 85, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session:

The question being on agreeing to the amendments proposed by Mr. Bacon, it was determined in the negative—yeas 18, nays 60.

Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Bacon, Bate, Berry, Blackburn, Carmack, Clark of Montana, Clay, Culberson, Dubois, Harris, Heitfeld, McLaurin of Mississippi, Mallory, Money, Simmons, Taliaferro, Teller, and Tillman.

Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Aldrich, Allison, Bard, Beveridge, Burnham, Burrows, Burton, Clapp, Clark of Wyoming, Cockrell, Cullom, Deboe, Dietrich, Dillingham, Dolliver, Fairbanks, Foraker, Foster of Louisiana, Foster of Washington, Frye, Gallinger, Gamble, Gibson, Hale, Hansbrough, Hawley, Hoar, Jones of Arkansas, Kean, Kearns, Kittredge, Lodge, McComas, McCumber, McEnery, McLaurin of South Carolina, McMillan, Martin, Mason, Millard, Mitchell, Morgan, Nelson, Penrose, Perkins, Pettus, Platt of Connecticut, Platt of New York, Pritchard, Proctor, Quarles, Scott, Simon, Spooner, Stewart, Turner, Vest, Warren, Wellington, and Wetmore.

Pairs were announced as follows:

Mr. Bailey in the affirmative with Mr. Elkins in the negative.

Mr. Rawlins in the affirmative with Mr. Hanna in the negative.

Sixty Senators thus voted that in the existing treaty, the very one we are discussing now, the United States must observe and be bound by the provisions of that treaty which require equality and forbid any discriminations. It is rather amusing, Mr. Speaker, to note that among the 65 who voted in favor of the Davis amendment and among the 60 who voted against the Bacon amendment, are some of the identical men now, who are loudly claiming that the United States was not one of those nations included within the words "all nations," and that it was never intended that the United States should be included in the words "all nations," and that we can do as we please with our own with no pledges to bind us. The very men who make these contentions are among those who voted that this Nation should be bound, when the treaty itself was under consideration. [Applause.]

RECENT HISTORY.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the United States has some history which bears upon this question. Some of you may be familiar with the dispute which we had with Canada, concerning our waterways on the north. In 1871 the United States made a treaty with Great Britain concerning the use of these waterways. Section 27 of that treaty provided in substance that—

Great Britain agreed to urge upon the Dominion of Canada to secure to the citizens of the United States, the use of the canals in the Dominion of Canada "on terms of equality" with the inhabitants of the Dominion.

While that treaty was in force in 1888, and again in 1891, representations were made by the United States that the stipulated equality in the use of the canals was denied in Canada. The tolls charged on grain, flour, and certain other articles passing through the Welland Canal amounted to 20 cents a ton, but for some years, by an annual order in council issued before the opening of lake navigation, a rebate of 18 cents a ton was granted on grain carried to Montreal or points east thereof. The effect of this system, which violated, as the United States maintained, the stipulated equality, was aggravated by the ultimate denial of any rebate on cargoes transshipped, as often as necessary, for the passage through the canal from larger to smaller vessels if the transfer was made in a United States port. On April 4, 1892, a new order in council was issued, which, while fixing the canal tolls at 20 cents a ton on freight of all kinds, allowed a rebate of 18 cents on wheat, Indian corn, peas, barley, rye, oats, flaxseed, and buckwheat originally shipped and actually carried to Montreal or any port east thereof in case such products were exported, and provided that the right to the rebate should not be lost by intermediate transshipment if it took place in Canada. By another order in council, dated April 11, 1890, and mentioned by the United States as a discrimination, the toll on cargoes bound eastward was reduced from 20 cents to 10 cents a ton, while the full rate was continued on cargoes bound westward.

VESSELS TREATED ALIKE.

The Canadian Government argued that its orders in council, as they applied to Canadian and American vessels alike, did not infringe the treaty.

The United States replied that the treaty guaranteed equality of treatment not merely to vessels of the United States, but also to their citizens; that this equality was violated by the system in question, since it required grain bound to the United States ports to pay ten times as much toll as grain bound to Montreal and so discriminated against American vessels, ports, consumers, and trade routes.

AMERICANS PROTEST.

This contention was carefully investigated by Secretary Bayard, who was impressed with the justice of the claims of the shipping interests of the United States. Practically every chamber of commerce and commercial organization along the Great Lakes, passed strongly condemnatory resolutions and appointed committees to protest against the Canadian injustice and inequality of treatment. President Cleveland then called the attention of Congress to this discrimination in his regular message, found in Foreign Relations, 1888, first volume, page 813, and by a special message to Congress August 23, 1888, House Executive Document No. 434, Fiftieth Congress, first session, page 7. The Canadians gave no heed to our demands, but continued to adhere to their construction of the treaty as to these discriminations. The administration of President Harrison again called the attention of Congress to this condition, in Foreign Relations, 1892, page 277; and President Harrison submitted to Congress a special message on June 20, 1892, Senate Executive Document No. 114, Fifty-second Congress, first session, setting forth the substance of the controversy, including an elaborate report and argument on this subject by our Department of State, contending that the terms of such treaty cover all vessels, citizens, and subjects, ports and places, and trade routes and traffic of both nations.

There is here inserted excerpts from the messages of President Harrison and the reports of the officials of the Department of State, clearly stating the controversy, and its analogy to the controversy concerning the Panama Canal is obvious.

President Harrison, in his message to the Senate June 20, 1892, said, in part:

The report of Mr. Partridge, the Solicitor of the Department of State, which accompanies the letter of the Secretary of State, states these discriminations very clearly. That these orders as to canal tolls and rebates are in direct violation of article 27 of the treaty of 1871 seems to be clear. It is wholly evasive to say that there is no discrimination between Canadian and American vessels; that the rebate is allowed to both, without favor, upon grain carried through to Montreal, or transshipped at a Canadian port to Montreal. The treaty runs:

"To secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion."

It was intended to give to consumers in the United States, to our people engaged in railroad transportation, and to those exporting from our ports equal terms in passing their merchandise through these canals. This absolute equality of treatment was the consideration for concessions on the part of this Government made in the same article of the treaty, and which have been faithfully kept. It is a matter of regret that the Canadian Government has not responded promptly to our request for the removal of these discriminating tolls.

The papers submitted show how serious the loss inflicted is upon our lake vessels and upon some of our lake ports. In view of the fact that the Canadian commissioners still contest with us the claim that these tolls are discriminating and insist that they constitute no violation of the letter or spirit of article 27 of the treaty, it would seem appropriate that Congress, if the view held by the Executive is approved, should with deliberation and yet with promptness, take such steps as may be necessary to secure the just rights of our citizens.

Secretary of State Blaine, in a letter to President Harrison April 15, 1892, in part said:

It is obviously in violation of the provisions of the twenty-seventh article of the treaty of 1871.

Solicitor of State Department Partridge to Secretary of State Blaine, April 14, 1892, stated in part:

Although the circumstances in the case required that article 27 of the treaty of 1871 should take the form which it did, it can not be doubted that it was intended to secure thereby complete equality to the citizens of each country in the use of the canals of the other necessary to the navigation of the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River.

This order discriminates against our citizens in at least three respects:

(1) In that it makes the toll on grain for export from Montreal and other Canadian ports east of Montreal 2 cents per ton, while the toll on grain for export from American ports is 20 cents per ton.

(2) In that even the lesser rate is refused on grain for Montreal and ports east, if it has been transshipped at a Canadian port.

(3) In that the 2-cent rate only is levied on grain for Montreal and ports east from any Canadian Lake Ontario port, while the 20-cent rate is exacted on grain for the same destination from American Lake Ontario ports. This is a new discrimination not contained in the order of March 25, 1891.

Recently this subject was again presented to the department quite fully by a memorial from the Lake Carriers' Association of Buffalo, N. Y., dated September 18, 1891. Since then memorials have also been received from the Milwaukee Chamber of Commerce, Chicago Board of Trade, the Cleveland Board of Trade, the Detroit Board of Trade, the Oswego Board of Trade, the Rochester Chamber of Commerce, and from other associations and individuals.

It does not relieve the position of the Dominion Government with respect to the grain rebate, that considerable of the grain carried to Montreal and the East is shipped from ports of the United States, and that, the transportation of such grain being open to American vessels, they can secure the rebate on the same conditions on which it is given to Canadian vessels. * * * An equality in the use of the canals to American vessels would not alone satisfy the conditions of the treaty.

The distinction between the vessel and the cargo is recognized by the Canadian Government, which exact distinct tolls for each. Neither does the treaty provide for equality in tolls only. The conditions imposed upon the use of the canals discriminate against American shippers and consumers, American transportation companies and routes, and American ports. This present practice of the Canadian Government is probably even a greater discrimination against our citizens than if directed against our vessels.

President Harrison in his message to the Senate July 1, 1892, said in part:

The position taken by this Government, as expressed in my previous communication to the Senate, that the equal tolls and regulations of which complaint has been made are in violation of our treaty with Great Britain, is not shaken but rather confirmed. There can be no doubt that a serious discrimination against our citizens and our commerce exists, and quite as little doubt that this discrimination is not the incident but the purpose of Canadian regulations.

BRITISH CONTENTION SAME AS FREE TOLLS.

Mr. Herbert, of the British Legation, Washington, D. C., to Acting Secretary of State Wharton, June 24, 1892, stated in part:

The effect of this order in council is to fix the rate of toll on all of the specified products passing through the Welland Canal and the St. Lawrence canals, without discrimination as to nationality. Vessels of both countries are entitled to the rebate and also to transship, provided that such transshipment be made at a Canadian port. If, however, the transshipment takes place at an American port, the vessel loses its right to the rebate. And the loss of rebate would apply equally to both Canadian and American vessels. In like manner, the vessels of neither country would obtain rebate should they land at a point short of Montreal, either on the American or Canadian side. * * * In favoring their national route the Canadian Government do so on precisely the same conditions with regard to both nations, and they contend, therefore, that they have acted in accordance with the obligations which Great Britain has requested them to take under article 27 of the treaty of Washington. The stipulation in that article is that the United States citizens shall use the Canadian canals on terms of equality with the people of the Dominion. And this equality is, in the opinion of the Canadian Government, preserved by the imposition of the same conditions and the granting of the same privileges, with the same restrictions, to vessels of both nationalities.

A memorandum by Assistant Secretary of State Adee, June 28, 1892, contained in part:

If the object were to favor the use of the Canadian canals and that object was carried out impartially, citizens of the United States would have little or no cause to complain. Moreover, the defense of the Canadian Government is confined to alleging that no discrimination, in fact, is made between Canadian and United States vessels carrying the favored cargoes through the canals, when the treaty of Washington makes the treatment of citizens the sole test of equality in the use of the canals. That the order does favor and is intended to favor the citizens of Canada at the expense of citizens of the United States is clear, looking at the order as a whole. Were the purpose of fostering the Canadian export trade accomplished by a bounty to the vessels carrying grain cargoes from the St. Lawrence ocean ports the case might be different, but the purpose is effected by levying differential tolls in and for the use of the Welland and St. Lawrence River Canals, so that the encouragement of the export trade is converted into such a discrimination against the enjoyment of the canals by citizens of the United States as the treaty of Washington expressly aimed to guard against.

As to this the Canadian reply merely says "the loss of rebate would apply equally to both Canadian and American vessels," thus narrowing the contention to the equal treatment of vessels and ignoring the engagements of the treaty as to the equal treatment of citizens.

* * * The order is in this regard a naked discrimination against the American citizen, for the enforcement of which the canal tolls are employed as a convenient instrument.

As to the traffic passing through the St. Lawrence River canals, a third discrimination exists which is in absolute and open violation of the intent of the treaty, for if the starting point of the grain cargo for export be a Canadian Lake Ontario port, the toll is but 2 cents per ton, while the 20-cent rate is exacted on grain for the same destination from the American Lake Ontario ports. * * *

The Canadian Government is, therefore, silent as to this, perhaps the most intentionally vexatious discrimination against the stipulated privilege of citizens of the United States to use the Canadian canals "on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion."

PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS.

Bills providing for retaliation against such discrimination on the part of Canada, and representing the views of the Department of State, were introduced in the Senate by Senator Davis, of Minnesota, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and in the House by Representative Blount, of Georgia, then chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs. The committee favorably and unanimously reported such bill without amendment, and Judge Blount, in his report, indorsed and included the very able and comprehensive report of Solicitor Partridge and Assistant Secretary of the Department of State Adee, and in addition stated as follows:

The treaty of 1871 permits Canadian citizens the use of St. Marys Canal on the same terms as our own citizens. It opens St. Clair Channel on the same terms. This the Canadian enjoys in all his comprehensiveness. It was expected that the Welland and other canals in Canada would be open to American citizens on the same terms.

This would enable the traffic which debouches from our territory into the Great Lakes to find an outlet into Ontario ports and the Atlantic Ocean, on equality as to charges with the Canadian citizen. The same principle would apply as to products and tonnage on the return traffic. Following the report of Solicitor Partridge, Mr. Blount concludes: "All efforts to secure a just interpretation of all treaty rights of American citizens have been met in a spirit of evasion, avoidance, and delay. Such conduct is notably dishonest in purpose and deceitful in method, and almost reaches the point of contumely and insult."

This vigorous language characterizes the exact construction of a treaty, and the exact contention now made by the advocates of the policy of free tolls for our coastwise vessels in the Panama Canal.

PROCEEDINGS IN HOUSE.

On the 21st day of July, 1892, the bill came before the House for consideration, and Judge Blount, the chairman of the committee, and Mr. Hitt, of Illinois, the ranking Republican member of the committee, both discussed the bill, calling attention to the outrageous discriminations and violation of the treaty by Canada and urging this measure of retaliation. Following are extracts from their remarks upon this bill, found in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Fifty-second Congress, first session, page 6531 et seq.:

Mr. Blount said in part:

The President of the United States has in two messages during this session of Congress called the attention of the Congress of the United States to the conditions of the rights of American citizens in the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other Canadian canals. The twenty-seventh article of the treaty was intended to give our own citizens the same right to use these canals that was accorded to the citizens of Canada.

It was claimed on the part of the Canadian Government that as the rebate applied to "vessels," and our vessels were covered by its terms, provided their cargoes took the lines indicated by the order, there was absolute "equality"; but the language of the treaty shows that it had relation not only to vessels but to citizens. It was intended for the benefit of the consumers in our own country; it was intended to give advantages to our ports; it was intended to give advantages to our transportation companies. The Canadians have sought by this technical construction to evade the spirit of the treaty. The proposition in the pending bill is to allow the President of the United States to prescribe tolls to be levied at the St. Marys Canal on products passing through there, and also to provide that those tolls shall not operate against American vessels plying to ports within our own territory.

The object is to apply to Canadian citizens using that canal a rule similar to that which the Canadians apply to American citizens using their canals. It is expected that in this way we shall secure a recognition of our rights under the treaty. It is believed that the result of this course on the part of our Government will be to put an end to the delay and evasion which has characterized the negotiations of the Canadian commissioners with our State Department upon this subject and to compel on the part of Canada a recognition of our rights under the treaty.

* * * The President of the United States, interpreting this treaty, says:

"The treaty runs to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with inhabitants of the Dominion. It was intended to give to consumers in the United States, to our own people engaged in railroad transportation, and to those exporting from our ports, equal terms in passing their merchandise through these canals."

If this is a correct interpretation—and I believe it is—why should we submit to a ruinous and wrongful interpretation?

The bill provides simply for the application of the same rule laid down by the Canadian authorities in reference to their own merchandise—nothing more, nothing less. Let them conform to the terms of the treaty, and the President has no power. But we have had first one evasion and then another; we have had delays and misunderstandings. But no Canadian, if he and his Government act rightly, is harmed thereby.

Mr. Hitt said in part:

Mr. Speaker, this bill is one which deeply concerns our people in the Northwest and the North and the exporting cities of the East. It is intended to prevent the continuance of a gross injustice, to redress by retaliation a great wrong to the grain interest, to secure a treaty right to which we are entitled and for which we have paid and are paying. Our people send their vast crops to the East by lake and by canal and by concurrent railroads for export. These crops pass in almost immeasurable volume by water during the season of water navigation. The passage from Lake Erie to Lake Ontario is by the Welland Canal. By our treaty with Great Britain, the words which have just been read to the House, we are entitled to "the use of that canal on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion of Canada."

We keep faith; but while we do this how is it upon that Welland Canal, upon which we are entitled to equality of treatment? Every ton of cargo that passes through the Welland Canal to the American port for export is, in fact, charged exactly ten times the toll that is exacted upon the cargo that is to be exported from a Canadian port. That is the interpretation which a Canadian ministry gives to the words of a treaty so simple that a child could not mistake its meaning.

Yet the provisions in the Canadian treaty requiring equality and prohibiting discrimination were not nearly so clear and comprehensive as in the Panama treaty. The bill was then passed unanimously. In the Senate it was favorably reported from the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations by Senator Frye, of Maine, and was passed unanimously by the Senate on the 22d day of July, 1892, and signed by President Harrison on the 26th day of July, 1892.

RETALIATION.

Under it, on the 18th day of August, 1892, President Harrison issued a proclamation making retaliation for such discrimination. This caused Canada and Great Britain to recede from their action and revise their previous obnoxious construction of the provisions of the treaty. So, on the 21st day of February, 1893, the President withdrew the retaliation. Thus was established by the action of both Governments the construction by legislative and executive action that the words "equality of treatment of our citizens with the inhabitants of Canada" includes both coastwise and foreign trade as to all vessels, citizens and subjects, ports and places, and trade and routes and traffic.

The act of retaliation is still on the statute books of the United States, Twenty-seventh Statutes at Large, page 267, being chapter 248, Fifty-second Congress, first session, and may be found on page 153, Navigation Laws of the United States, 1907, and is construed by the War Department as yet in force and can be made effective at any moment, should the occasion require.

CONSTRUCTION BY UNITED STATES.

Here is a recent authoritative construction by the United States itself and all its political departments on behalf of our own citizens, our own commerce and interests, that the words "equality of treatment of our citizens with the inhabitants of Canada" in the British treaty of 1871 included both coastwise and foreign trade and vessels, citizens, ports, and traffic. This contention and construction was insisted upon by Presidents Cleveland and Harrison and by Secretaries of State Bayard, Blaine, and Foster. The House and Senate committees by report, and the two Houses separately and unanimously sustained such construction and contention, and their act is yet upon the statute books and expresses the legislative and executive judgment and will upon such subject. Great Britain and Canada yielded reluctantly to such construction, but they finally acquiesced, and for 20 years it has met the acceptation of all.

SAME OFFICIALS IN BOTH TREATIES.

During this controversy many of the American and British officials took part in this matter who subsequently participated in the framing and ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. They were familiar with all of the phases of the exhaustive contention, and this may explain the peculiar language and indefinite terms in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty on this point, as against the shorter language in the earlier treaty of 1871. The language of the latter was to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the canal, and so forth, on "terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion." This language, by agreement and through our own construction, includes coastwise and foreign vessels, commerce, citizens and subjects, places and ports, routes and traffic. Many of these same officials five years later began the draft of this new treaty between the same nations concerning the interoceanic canal, which was concluded eight years later, in which is found the language:

> The canal shall be free and open to the commerce and war vessels of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

It is to be noted that the language is far broader and stronger, to prevent any possible discrimination or difference, than in the earlier treaty, and undoubtedly was so done in view of the very controversy above described, and to prevent any possible recurrence of such a misunderstanding in the future.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. If you will allow me, I will answer that as I go along. I think I know what the gentleman has in mind. [Laughter.] I think I will answer the gentleman, but possibly not altogether to his satisfaction.

Now, the situation is that on our northern border we had a treaty with the words, "equality of treatment of our citizens with the inhabitants of Canada," which must include, by force of our contention, the coastwise trade of Canada. On the southern border we have another treaty with Great Britain, for "terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination as to any nation, its citizens or subjects, as to charges or conditions of traffic." The statute on our books provides that this language shall not include our coastwise trade. We compel Canada to include its coastwise trade on the north; under stronger language we refuse to include our coastwise trade on the south.

Now, coming to what I think the gentleman from California has in mind, our opponents are stating, and the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] stated, and correctly, that—

> Canada has never to this day admitted that her grant of rebates was inconsistent with her treaty obligations. Quite the contrary. For the British ambassador presented notes to our Secretary of State just prior to the close of the incident, and after the abandonment of the system of rebates by Canada, in which he claimed that "every obligation of the treaty has been fully and unreservedly met." His statement also holds firmly to their "contention that they were justified in adopting the tolls and rebates," and adds, "The difference of opinion which exists as to the treaty rights of the two countries is to be regretted, but it forms no ground for a charge that either country in maintaining its own views proceeds with a disregard of solemn obligations."

MENACE.

Inadvertently the gentleman from California has outlined the menace of the situation, and that is what I desire, as seriously as I am capable, to call to the attention of this House, and especially to the Members from the Central West. Consider what the situation is. I have the official documents here, both from Canada and the United States, and I exhibit them to you. They report as follows:

Freight passed through the Canadian Soo Canal in 1913: Canadian freight, 4,951,467 tons, or 11.6 per cent; American freight, 37,747,457 tons, or 88.4 per cent; total, 42,699,324 tons.

Total freight, 1913, 79,721,525 tons.

Freight passed through the Canadian Soo Canal in 1912: Canadian freight, 4,090,362 tons, or 10.3 per cent; American freight 35,579,293 tons, or 89.7 per cent; total, 39,669,655 tons.

Freight passed through the American Soo Canal in 1912: Total freight, 32,824,815 tons, nearly all American.

CANADIAN AND AMERICAN TRAFFIC.

The public service of Canadian canals must be measured in the light of the nationality of the traffic. The canals are entirely free to the vessels of the United States and Canada. Up to 1909 no record was kept of the origin of cargoes; but since that year it has been possible to separate the business of the United States from that of Canada.

The facts with respect to the tonnage of vessels and of cargoes during the past six years are as follows:

Year.	Canadian vessels.		United States vessels.
	Number.	Tonnage.	Number.	Tonnage.
CANADIAN CANALS.
1908	29,040	6,780,789	7,489	4,835,320

1912	9,376,529	38,210,716	47,587,245
1913	11,130,875	40,923,038	52,053,913

Gathering the foregoing facts with respect to freight tonnage into percentage form, the result is as follows:

Year.	Canadian per cent.	American per cent.
CANADIAN CANALS.
1908	28.7	71.3

These totals and percentages relate entirely to freight tonnage which passed through the canals of Canada. They do not include the traffic which passed through the American canal at Sault Ste. Marie. At that point vessels passing up and down may take either the Canadian or American canal. When they pass through the Canadian canal a record is taken of the origin of the cargo, but when they pass through the American canal no such record is taken. Hence it is always impracticable to ascertain with exactness the volume of traffic which belongs to Canada. Until the United States takes cognizance of the origin of cargoes this unsatisfactory situation will continue.

A record is kept at the office of the Canadian canal at Sault Ste. Marie, and it was found that for 1913 but 6 per cent of all the freight tonnage which passed through both canals at that important gateway was carried in Canadian vessels.

Of this freight carried through the Soo Canals 94 per cent was in American vessels and 6 per cent in Canadian vessels. The average number of vessels passing through the locks per day were as follows in 1912:

Through Poe Lock (navigable water in lock, 18.5)---------- 38
Through Weitzel Lock (navigable water in lock, 12.9)---------- 25
Through Canadian Lock (navigable water in lock, 19)---------- 32

These figures show conclusively that the Canadian and the foreign business through these locks is of slight consequence, but that the bulk of it is the coastwise commerce of the United States.

AMERICAN VESSELS USED CANADIAN LOCK.

It is evident that the large American vessels used the Canadian Lock to a very great extent, while the Canadian vessels very slightly use the American Locks. So the retaliatory statute I have described can practically have no effect. This is unquestioned. The reasons are that frequently conditions of navigation make it more convenient, and, more important yet, the Canadian Lock has a navigable depth of 19 feet, while the Poe Lock has 18.5 feet. The Canadian Lock has 6 inches more water for actual use, and each inch will transport on the average about 100 additional tons of freight. By this the earning capacity of each freighter so using such depth, could be increased at least $450 for each trip, or double such sum for the round trip, and for a season would amount for each vessel to several thousands of dollars each year.

VALUE OF CANADIAN CANALS TO THE UNITED STATES.

In 1911 6,854 vessels passed the Canadian Lock, and it is probable that at least two-thirds of them were American. So that the value of such use in additional freightage for Americans would amount to fully $10,000,000 for the season.

These official statistics show two incontrovertible facts: First, that the retaliatory act of 1892 can have no terror for Canada, because her vessels no longer use our canal as they have a better one of their own. Second, our exports to Canada far exceed our imports from Canada, so there is nothing upon which we can retaliate; but rather the contrary, if Canada shall so decide.

You will note that the estimate for our coastwise trade through the Panama Canal during 1915, when it shall be opened, was 1,160,000 tons. That is insignificant compared with our vessels and freight using the Canadian canals for more than 40,000,000 tons annually. We can not exclude the Canadians from the use of the St. Clair channels, since they could equally exclude us from the use of the St. Lawrence River.

Why, the little Welland Canal, of only 14 feet depth, will carry far more American traffic than our coastwise traffic, protected by the Panama act, which will pass through the Panama Canal next year. [Applause.] Just think of it! Now, you gentlemen from the Central West who are proposing to vote for a policy which allows discrimination in favor of our commerce on the south, if that policy be continued by our Government, it will surely lead to the same kind of discrimination against our commerce in the north. [Applause.] The same rule will certainly work both ways, and it is our action on this measure which will either avert or bring on such a conflict. Now, let me show you how certain and important it is.

SHIP CANAL.

Next year I think the United States will finish its new canal at the Soo, with a depth of 24½ feet. But Canada has begun a new canal at the Soo, with a depth of 30 feet. Next year Canada will finish a new canal at Welland, with a draft of 30 feet. Canada has already finished three surveys for ship canals connecting the Great Lakes with the St. Lawrence River and, through it, the Atlantic Ocean. These ship canals, some of 30 feet draft, are under consideration, and one will certainly be constructed in the not far distant future. This preparation of 30-foot locks at Welland and the Soo indicates that soon ship canals will move sea traffic from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic Ocean. Now, if we insist upon a discriminating policy against Canada and in favor of the 1,000,000 tons or so of our coastwise commerce through the Panama Canal, we must expect a similarly discriminating policy on the part of Canada in favor of her own people and against our 40,000,000 tons in the use of her great waterways of the North. [Applause.]

Do you realize the volume of that commerce? The reports are that the Panama Canal when it shall be finished, if worked to its utmost 12 months in the year, will have the annual capacity to pass 80,000,000 tons of commerce. Last year the Soo Canals alone passed 79,721,525 tons of commerce, of which more than 94 per cent was American.

CENTRAL WEST.

Yet some of you men of the Central West are voting to discriminate against that 74,000,000 tons of our commerce, in favor of a petty million tons which may pass through the Panama Canal. [Applause.]

What does it mean to us in the Central West? It means that every acre of our land, every bushel of our grain, which competes with the land and the grain of Canada in the markets of the world, may be obliged to pay a discriminating charge in transit through Canadian canals to the world's markets, as against the competing grain and the land of Canada. Such discrimination will increase the value of every acre of Canadian land and of every bushel of Canadian grain, and proportionately decrease the value of our land and of our grain. [Applause.] The freight charges will be larger for our imports and our exports by this discrimination, to the direct advantage of our neighboring competitors.

I am unwilling to encourage and incite exactions against my people, in order to help those who already have had more than their fair share of the good things from this Government.

MICHIGAN.

I wish to call to the attention of the gentlemen from Michigan who propose to vote for a policy of discrimination, that your State lies right up against this great Canadian ship canal when it shall be finished; so that if your neighbors follow your example and pursue a discriminating policy as to their canals, as you propose to do as to ours, their seagoing vessels can unload their cargoes right opposite you and into the competing cities in Canada free of tolls or charges, but you will be made subject to charges which may practically prohibit their profitable use to you. You may see discriminating charges increase the advantages of your competitors across the straits from your flourishing and beautiful cities, and your competing industries may fade and languish through your action on this measure.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Many good men seem much terrified at the thought that the Canadian Pacific Railroad will greatly profit by the repeal of free tolls, and so in some mysterious way is powerfully operating toward the repeal. I have not known or had any reason to suspect any such activity on the part of that railroad company. My judgment is directly to the contrary, and I think that company has far more to gain by a policy of mutual discrimination than it could possibly lose from free tolls to American coastwise vessels. The probability is that the total freight movement from coast to coast, of the Canadian Pacific amounts to not more than 500,000 tons per annum. Most of that will continue to be so carried even after free tolls. There would be some loss on some traffic, but it would be comparatively slight. But if a policy of discrimination could be adopted by which Canada could force from the United States some of its industries, and build up the Canadian communities and interests at the expense of the neighboring competing American communities and interests, then the Canadian Pacific Railroad would really wax fat and prosper; then it could really extend its most profitable business, in which it would have almost a monopoly, and could indefinitely extend its operations. Canada and the Canadian Pacific Railroad would largely gain at the expense of our competing cities and trade along the Great Lakes. There is a real menace which our free-tolls friends can not seem to comprehend, but it is in the person of one of the largest and ablest-managed corporations of the world which well knows how to take advantage of such blunders as this Panama act.

NOT TOLLS ALONE.

Remember that a discriminating policy need not cover tolls alone. There are all sorts of ways where discriminating policies may be pursued against you and your people and your commerce. Tolls would only be a small part. Pilotage, towage, tonnage, light, harbor, and dockage dues, insurance and demurrage, and there are infinite ways in which those shrewd competitive nations may discriminate against our commerce if they are so disposed. Now, the gentleman from California states that the Canadians maintain that they have the right to do it under that old treaty. If we have a right to discriminate under our treaty, I think clearly they can under that treaty. That is the serious question that the gentleman from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] desired to propound to me. [Applause.] I know it will be urged the treaty of 1871 has been replaced by the treaty of 1910, requiring equality of treatment. That is true, and I think it should be so construed. But so should the Panama treaty be so construed. If we initiate discrimination, they can repay in double measure. If we choose to misconstrue, they can follow our example to our infinite damage. You refuse to arbitrate such a dispute as this, they can equally refuse to arbitrate any such dispute as I have outlined. We then would be helpless, and our only redress would be war. Is not it best for both to continue to be fair and just and right in all our dealings with all our neighbors and all the nations?

NEW GRANADA.

Now, there is another phase of our history that should be remembered and to which I especially wish to call the attention of my friends from New York and California. In 1846 we made a treaty with New Granada concerning communications across the Isthmus of Panama, which covered all kind of transportation. That treaty provided that our people and our commerce should be treated on equal terms with the people and the commerce of New Granada. You will recall that was about the time of the discovery of gold fields in California. Thousands of our citizens and thousands of tons of our commerce passed over that great highway. The Governments of Panama and Colombia sought to discriminate in numberless ways against our citizens and commerce. They passed and exercised various acts of discrimination against our people. Our people bitterly complained. The records of the State Department contain hundreds of protests, hundreds of complaints, from the citizens of California and from the citizens of New York against the Governments of Panama and New Granada. Our Presidents, our Secretaries of State, our ministers, protested, sometimes effectively, sometimes in vain.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman may proceed and take all the time he wishes. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. We protested, I say. Twice warships were sent to enforce equality of treatment, once by a Democratic administration and once by a Republican administration, and we forced New Granada and we forced little Colombia and little Panama to yield to our citizens and to our commerce equality of treatment in the passage of that Isthmus.

Now, that same treaty is in force. Secretary Knox officially notified the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that that same treaty is in force and effect right now. Secretary ROOT and Secretary Hay based their negotiations with Colombia on the fact that that treaty is in force.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In that treaty did not the United States guarantee that it would maintain the sovereignty and integrity of New Granada, and was it not later a party to the separation of Panama from it? [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Oh, we will discuss that when we come to it; but that does not concern this question that we did require Colombia and New Granada to yield to us equality of treatment. While that same treaty is now in force, we propose to continue a law and adopt a policy which shall forbid equality of treatment by us to them. By the law now on the books, we propose to exercise against them the same sort of discrimination which we sent warships and cannon to forbid them making against us. I leave it to you to decide as to the honesty and sincerity of that nation and that people who, after they know the facts, will insist upon that sort of discrimination and inconsistency. [Applause.]

LATIN AMERICA.

Mr. Speaker, consider the situation as to Latin America. I think eight or nine other nations face the two oceans, as we do, and may have intercourse between their coasts and the different parts of their countries exactly as we do. I will place them in the RECORD, so that you can see the names for yourselves: Canada, United States, Mexico, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Panama, and Colombia. Some of those nations have this provision in their treaties of commerce and navigation with the United States:

The two high contracting parties, being likewise desirous of placing the commerce and navigation of their respective countries on the liberal basis of perfect equality and reciprocity, mutually agree that the citizens of each, etc., shall enjoy all the rights, privileges, and exemptions in navigation and commerce which native citizens do and shall enjoy, etc. But it is understood that this article does not include the coasting trade of either country, the regulation of which is reserved by the parties, respectively, according to their own separate laws.

Now, these people have the right to say, and they do say practically to us, "You have a treaty concerning Panama that provides that the commerce shall be on terms of entire equality, with no discrimination, making no exception for your coastwise trade. When you make a treaty with us providing for perfect equality and reciprocity, you compel us to make a direct exception of our coastwise trade in order that we may retain advantages under it. When you make a treaty concerning the canal, providing for entire equality, with no exception of coastwise trade, you nevertheless do except your coastwise trade without any language authorizing you to do it, such as you compelled us to employ. You discriminate directly against us without any reservation or notice. If we make such discrimination we are compelled to make reservation and notice." This in effect is a discrimination, under the treaty terms, against every single one of those Latin American countries.

RECENT DISTRUST.

No one can wonder at the instinctive distrust against us, and the revulsion of feeling from the time when they expressed their kindly sentiments by a resolution adopted at the Pan American Conference at the City of Mexico on the 22d day of January, 1902, as follows:

The Republics assembled at the International Conference of Mexico applaud the purpose of the United States Government to construct an interoceanic canal, and acknowledge that this work will not only be worthy of the greatness of the American people, but also in the highest sense a work of civilization, and to the highest degree beneficial to the development of commerce between the American States and other countries of the world.

That splendid evidence of good feeling continued, and the trips to and through those nations of Secretaries ROOT and Knox greatly increased and intensified it, yet you now propose by a policy of discrimination without basis or notice, to injure their commerce in comparison with our treatment of our own. It will not do, and it will not pay, merely for a million tons or so of our coastwise trade.

CANAL TREATIES.

They point to another fact, that a list of treaties, somewhat incomplete, concerning these transoceanic waterways is as follows: United States with New Granada, ratified June 10, 1848; United States with Colombia, concluded January 14, 1869; United States with Colombia, concluded January 26, 1870; United States with Colombia, concluded August 8, 1873; United States with Colombia, concluded February 17, 1881.

All of these treaties contained, in substance, the provision in the thirty-fifth article of the original treaty of 1846 securing to all nations, including ourselves, the free and equal right of passage of the interoceanic waterway.

The United States with Honduras, concluded July 4, 1864. Same as in the preceding treaties with New Granada. United States with Nicaragua, concluded June 21, 1849; United States with Nicaragua, concluded September 3, 1849; United States with Nicaragua, concluded November 16, 1857; United States with Nicaragua, concluded June 20, 1869; United States with Nicaragua, concluded February 28, 1877.

These contain either the language of the New Granada treaty of 1848 with reference to tolls or such as the following: "For all vessels on equal terms in every respect as between each other."

The United States with Costa Rica, in 1876, with provisions the same as Nicaragua.

All these have been invariably construed by all these nations, and all other nations, to include both coastwise and foreign trade to be on equal terms and without discrimination. All administrations and officials of our Government have followed this policy. This has been especially emphasized by two treaties, or attempted treaties, which especially except the coastwise trade, as follows:

TREATY FOR COASTWISE PREFERENCE.

The treaty of the United States with Nicaragua concluded December 1, 1884, known as the Frelinghuysen-Zelaya treaty, contained the provision "equal tolls for the vessels of all nations"—excepting the vessels of the contracting parties engaged in the coastwise trade.

This treaty draft is very important to consider in this controversy for this reason, that it conclusively shows that all previous treaties containing the words "equal terms," or their equivalent, included both coastwise and foreign vessels and trade, and that the United States did not contend or expect that a construction of such terms implied that its own coastwise trade was to be necessarily excluded by implication. No one thought of such a construction. But, on the contrary, when it was desired by our Government that the coastwise trade should be excluded from the general provision as to "equal terms to all nations," it was found necessary to expressly provide for such exclusion, as was done in the Frelinghuysen-Zelaya treaty.

In the treaty with Mexico of June 30, 1854, Gadsden treaty, section 8 provides:

And at no time shall higher charges be made on the transit of persons or property of citizens of the United States than may be made on the transit of the persons or property of other foreign nations.

This shows conclusively that it has been a uniform policy of treaty making, concerning transisthmian traffic, that when it is desired to discriminate in favor of domestic commerce, it must be so provided in express terms. You can realize the situation as to every nation in the world which desires to except its coastwise trade in its treaty agreements, that this must be expressly so provided. There are more than 30 of these nations which have treaties directly exempting their coastwise trade from the operation of these treaties of commerce and navigation. I will place this list in the RECORD.

[1] Year's notice of abrogation given.

I can realize some of the conditions which were outlined so eloquently yesterday by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER]. There are probably 30 of these treaties. If the other nations attempted to construe them as we are construing this Panama treaty, by insisting on discrimination when we have agreed to treat equally and without discrimination, then hereafter our commerce and navigation would be absolutely unprotected. [Applause.] We must expect that all of these treaties will be hereafter construed as we here set the example. No one treaty stands solitary and by itself. These were all based upon the sound proposition that when we desire to exempt any of our domestic interests from the general terms, we must so say squarely and give notice fairly. If not, then all are included. A departure from this principle will be fraught with peril to our people and commerce.

FREEDOM AND EQUALITY.

Now, just a moment further. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] and others have very eloquently argued that this measure is a departure from our policy of freedom from tolls for our vessels, in the use of our national waterways. Let us look at that proposition just a moment. In 1884 we did pass an act providing for freedom of tolls for our vessels on all domestic waterways; but at the same time under these treaties, which I have above referred to, we also provided for equality of treatment of all vessels domestic and foreign. So that all through these years, all vessels of all kinds of all nations have passed through our waterways, every river and harbor of the United States, under the protection of two provisions—first, freedom from tolls; and, second, equality of treatment. Right now a foreign vessel—English, German, or French—has the same right to come into the Potomac River free from tolls, which our vessels have. An English, French, or German vessel can use the Mississippi River to St. Paul or might ascend the Ohio River to Pittsburgh as freely and without charge as our own vessels, except that foreign vessels can not take on coastwise business. They can use the great harbors of New York, San Francisco, Boston, and Baltimore exactly as our vessels and commerce can do. The only difference is that they can not carry goods from port to port in the United States. But the foreign vessel has identically the same right of equality of treatment, with that exception. Two years ago we did make a difference in that policy as to the Panama Canal, by changing the rule as to equality of tolls. Now by this bill we change the rule as to freedom from tolls, and we do it for this reason: The Panama Canal is an international waterway. It is not a domestic waterway. It will be mainly patronized by the great commercial nations of the world. Our local canals, rivers, and harbors are mainly patronized by our own people and our own commerce.

FREE TOLLS SOME TIME.

If the time shall ever come—and it may—when the bulk of the commerce through the canal shall be for our domestic benefit, and it will be of greater advantage to us to make a free waterway at Panama, just as we have everywhere else, we have a perfect right to do it. But other nations can fairly claim to be included in our policy, just as we have included them in our policy as to treatment of our other canals and rivers and harbors and as they have included us in an equal policy as to their rivers and canals. It is a business proposition as to whether we want the nations of the world to contribute their share to the cost of construction, maintenance, and upkeep of that tremendous project. Our contention is that as a business proposition it ought to be done; that our people ought not to pay it alone; and, if it ought to be done, then we must compel these nations to pay, and if they do pay, then we ought to pay also. We have agreed to do so. We pursue that policy everywhere else. It is the only safe policy for us in our international dealings, and those who use the canal can very well afford to pay their share of its maintenance, and the expense for the blessings which they directly receive. That is the contention. [Applause.]

COASTWISE TRADE.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is very strongly argued by nearly everybody that we have a perfect right to do as we please in our coastwise trade, because our coastwise trade is confined to our own people, and foreigners can not engage or compete in it. I wish to differ emphatically from that proposition. Our coastwise trade is not confined to our own people or our own traffic. I know that you gentlemen may be startled, but I wish you would read the laws with me which bear upon this most important part of this discussion. First let me turn to the treaty itself. Those of you who have it convenient, will please notice what the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty are which are now in force. I have it here—article 3, section 1. I will read it slowly, so that you may realize how important this is:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality—

That refers solely to vessels. The canal shall be open to vessels on terms of entire equality—

So that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the charges or conditions of traffic or otherwise.

The second clause relates solely to the traffic. There are two entirely different and distinct parts of this treaty concerning commerce—the first relating solely to vessels, the second relating solely to traffic. It is true that no vessel except an American vessel can engage in coastwise trade. But it is equally true that almost every foreigner, nearly every citizen of a foreign country, can engage in the coastwise traffic, and that foreign traffic can clearly engage in coastwise trade; and you gentlemen of the Democratic side have invited them and their traffic to engage in the coastwise trade. I voted against the proposition to encourage too much of such foreign traffic in our own business. I believe you are doing more than you ought to; but you have made it the law that they have the right to engage in coastwise traffic. Now, let us see the application of that in these different ways.

COASTWISE TRAFFIC.

First, a vessel has a right to bring traffic from Europe, say, from Hamburg or Liverpool or Havre, finally destined for San Francisco, land it at New York and transfer to an American coastwise vessel, which will take it through the canal to San Francisco. That traffic will go through the canal free of tolls. If it went directly, it would be obliged to pay toll. That is a discrimination against that traffic. [Applause.]

Again, merchandise for Europe destined for the Orient can be transferred at New York into an American registered vessel clearing for San Francisco. This vessel so laden would go through the canal free of tolls, and when at San Francisco could either transfer the goods to a vessel bound for the Orient or take out clearance for the Orient, without discharging such cargo. In either case the cargo would pass through the canal free of tolls. If sent directly, either in American or foreign vessel, it would pay toll. That seems clearly a discrimination against such traffic. The reverse would also be true. Freight from the Orient destined for New York or Europe would be transferred to an American registered vessel at San Francisco clearing for New York. It would pass the canal free of tolls. Then it would either transfer at New York or take new clearance from New York for Europe. This traffic would be free from tolls. Direct traffic either in American or foreign vessel would pay toll. This is a direct discrimination against such traffic.

Extract from article by Russell L. Dunn, of San Francisco, placed in the RECORD of April 1, 1914, by Senator WORKS, of California:

Payment of the present Panama Canal toll imposed on foreign trade of our States, if it should be found constitutional, would be avoided in the Pacific coast traffic by making Colon, at the Atlantic end of the canal, the port of export for Pacific Coast States products brought to it in coastwise traffic and the port of import of the Pacific Coast States for foreign imports. Practically the foreign ships and coastwise ships would interchange cargoes at Colon, both exports and imports of the foreign trade going through the canal in coastwise shipping and thus exempt from toll, the cost of interchanging cargoes being very much less than the present $1.20 per ton toll charge.

If the trade principles set forth here be made effective, the main result would be to injure the legitimate business of our people with each other, by opening the way for a dodging and evasion of tolls by transfer at Cristobal in the zone.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Do you not think that we should pass a law that would prohibit such a thing as that?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will come to that, and I will ask the gentleman whether he would vote for it or not. I do not believe one of you would vote for such a proposition.

Again, two vessels, one American and one foreign, start from New York, both cleared and bound for San Francisco, both loaded with freight to be discharged en route. The American vessel, registered for foreign trade, and yet allowed to coast under our laws, proceeds and unloads all of its freight en route and arrives in San Francisco without paying any canal tolls. The foreign vessel does exactly the same thing, but pays the canal tolls. That is a discrimination against that traffic. The fact that such can be done under our existing law has been doubted, so I went to the Department of Commerce myself and obtained a copy of a ruling dated August 5, 1913, construing the law as to this very situation. I will insert the pertinent parts of the departmental decision in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, so that there shall not be any doubt but that my statement is correct, and that such discrimination can and will be actually practiced if the present law be continued in force:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF NAVIGATION,
Washington, August 5, 1913.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS,
San Francisco, Cal.

SIR: Your letter of June 11 has been received, inclosing a protest from the California State Board of Pilot Commissioners against the action of your office in allowing the American barkentine Irmgard, the American steamer Meteor, and the American ship W. F. Babcock, under enrollment and license with merchandise destined to foreign ports, to proceed to domestic ports to finish lading outward cargo.

The protest is transmitted by you to this office for decision under the act of July 5, 1884, which prescribes that the Commissioner of Navigation "shall be specially charged with the decision of all questions relating to the issue of registers, enrollments, and licenses of vessels."

Two statutes are in force making general provisions for the issue of documents by customs officers to assert the nationality and ownership and authorize the trade of vessels of the United States. The act of December 31, 1792, concerns the registering or recording of ships or vessels, and the act of February 18, 1793, provides for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries and for regulating the same.

These statutes were based upon and superseded the act of September 1, 1789, for registering and clearing vessels, regulating the coasting trade, and for other purposes. The first 15 sections of that act determined the requirements and established the methods for registering vessels. The twenty-second section prescribed the requirements and method for enrollment and annual license of ships owned by citizens of the United States "but not registered, if destined from district to district or to the bank or whale fisheries," which must be complied with "in order to be entitled to all the privileges of a ship or vessel belonging to the United States employed in the coasting trade or in the fisheries."

The twenty-third section of the act provided that the master, commander, or owner of every ship of 20 tons or upward to be employed in trade between different districts in the United States and of every vessel to be employed in the bank or whale fisheries "having a certificate of registry or enrollment as is herein directed" should be entitled to "a license to trade between the different districts in the United States or to carry on the bank or whale fishery for one year." Any vessel of 20 tons or upward not having a certificate of registry or enrollment and a license "found trading" between different districts or employed in the bank or whale fisheries was subject to the same tonnage and fees as foreign ships. The original act thus enabled the vessel under register as well as the vessel under enrollment to engage in the coasting trade and the fisheries upon procuring a license. This principle is followed in the acts of 1792 and 1793, which do not restrict the vessel under register to the foreign trade, although confining the vessel under enrollment and license to the coasting trade or to the whale, cod, or mackerel fisheries. The license, in addition to the register, is not prescribed by these acts.

The first section of the act of 1792 (sec. 4131, R. S.) provides that registered vessels and no others—except such as shall be duly qualified according to law for carrying on the coasting trade and fisheries, or one of them—shall be denominated and deemed vessels of the United States, entitled to the privileges appertaining to such ships or vessels.

However, the twentieth section (sec. 4361, R. S.) provides:

REGISTERED VESSELS.

"SEC. 20. When any ship or vessel of the United States, registered according to law, shall be employed in going from any one district in the United States to any other district, such ship or vessel, and the master or commander thereof, with the goods she may have on board, previous to her departure from the district, where she may be, and also upon her arrival in any other district, shall be subject (except as to the payment of fees) to the same regulations, provisions, penalties, and forfeitures, and the like duties are imposed on like officers as is provided by the sixteenth and seventeenth sections of this act for ships or vessels licensed for carrying on the coasting trade: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to extend to registered ships or vessels of the United States having on board goods, wares, and merchandise of foreign growth or manufacture brought into the United States in such ship or vessel from a foreign port and on which the duties have not been paid or secured according to law."

From the beginning of the Government, accordingly, Congress foresaw and provided for the lawful participation by a vessel under register in the coasting trade as well as its employment in the foreign trade for which the document is primarily designed. To the same effect may also be cited among later statutes section 5, act of February 28, 1871 (sec. 4401, R. S.).

On the other hand, the trade or employment in which a licensed vessel of the United States may lawfully engage is confined with narrow limits by the terms of the license and the statutes governing its issue and use. "A license to do any particular thing is a permission or authority to do that thing." (Gibbons v. Ogden.) Section 4 of the act of February 18, 1793 (R. S., 4321), prescribes "that this license shall not be used * * * for any other employment than is herein specified." The same section specifies that the license is granted for the vessel "to be employed in carrying on 'coasting trade,' 'whale fishery,' or 'cod fishery,' as the case may be." So closely are these limits of employment defined that in providing forfeiture as the penalty upon a licensed vessel "employed in any other trade than that for which she is licensed" Congress in 1836 added "but vessels which may be licensed for the mackerel fishery shall not incur such forfeiture by engaging in catching cod or fish of any other description whatever." The master of a licensed vessel (R. S., 4320) shall swear that "such license shall not be used for any other employment than that for which it was specially granted."

Again, the severest penalty, forfeiture, is imposed upon the licensed vessel which in employment goes beyond the particular thing it is authorized by its license to do.

COASTING TRADE.

Excluding the fisheries, vessels of the United States may engage in three recognized forms of trade: The coasting trade, for which a license is prescribed but which, as shown, may also be conducted by vessels under register; the foreign trade for which a register in the case of an American vessel is required, because under penalty of forfeiture enrolled and licensed vessels are excluded from it; and finally the combined foreign and coasting trade which may be carried on simultaneously by a vessel, for example, laden with cargo at an American port, part of which is destined for another American port and part of which is destined for a foreign port.

Employment simultaneously in the foreign and domestic or coasting trade on the Great Lakes is provided for by the act of March 2, 1831 (sec. 4318, R. S.).

"In these regions the domestic and the foreign trade are so blended that the same vessel is almost necessarily engaged in both at the same time and often during the same voyage. To meet this kind of trade the third section of that act says, in reference to vessels engaged in navigating those waters, that 'they shall be enrolled and licensed in such form as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury; which enrollment and license shall authorize any such boat, sloop, or other vessel to be employed either in the coasting or foreign trade, and no certificate of registry shall be required for vessels employed on said frontiers: Provided, That such boat, sloop, or other vessel shall be in every other respect liable to the rules, regulations, and penalties now in force relating to registered vessels on our northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers.'

"It is the obvious policy of this act to enable a class of vessels which are engaged in both the foreign and the coasting trade at the same time to do so without the necessity of taking out both a register and an enrollment. For this purpose the act makes the enrollment equivalent to both register and enrollment. In giving to the enrollment the effect of a register it very properly subjects the vessel to all the rules, regulations, and penalties relating to registered vessels." (The Mohawk, 3 Wall., 572, 573.)

RECOGNIZED BY CONGRESS.

The simultaneous employment in the foreign and coasting trades of one vessel on the Great Lakes has thus been recognized by Congress, and a specific document, the enrollment and license, was authorized in 1831 to cover both trades, subject to the qualification that the vessel so documented "shall be in every other respect liable to the regulations and penalties relating to registered and licensed vessels."

While the like simultaneous prosecution of the foreign and domestic or coasting trade on the seaboard has been a kind of commerce long antedating such trade on the Lakes, Congress has not in terms, other than those mentioned, given to one document on the seaboard the register or the enrollment and license authority to cover both trades except in the act of May 27, 1848, which prescribes the register. That act (sec. 3126, R. S.) "allows the steam packets between New York and New Orleans to stop at Habana to take in passengers, mails, etc., provided that no merchandise be landed or taken in." (Cong. Globe, Apr. 18, 1848.) Its main purpose is to provide for the issue to the ship of certified manifests at the American port of departure, to be presented at the American port of final destination, and thus simplify revenue requirements otherwise imposed in view of the stop at Habana to take on or discharge passengers. Soon after enactment it was available to meet the situation arising from the rush of gold hunters to California, when steamers from the Atlantic to the Pacific and vice versa under register stopped at Colon (Aspinwall) and Panama. The act, of course, is general in terms, and is applicable to later developments of trade, as the coasting trade between Pacific coast ports and Alaska when vessels touch at intermediate Canadian ports.

"The 'coasting trade' is a term well understood. The law had defined it, and all know its meaning perfectly. The act describes with great minuteness the various operations of a vessel engaged in it." (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, 214.) It first appears in our legislation in the third act of the First Congress, approved July 20, 1789, which in section 2 provides that no ship or vessel built within the United States and belonging to a citizen or citizens thereof shall, whilst employed in the coasting trade or in the fisheries, pay tonnage—6 cents per ton—more than once in any year. Section 3 provides that every ship or vessel employed in the transportation of any of the produce or manufacture of the United States coastwise within the said States, except such ship or vessel be built within the said States and belong to a citizen or citizens thereof, shall on each entry pay 50 cents per ton. In this early act of Congress the words "employed in the coasting trade or in the fisheries" are carefully restricted to vessels built in the United States and belonging to citizens thereof. Where foreign-built or foreign-owned vessels are treated in the immediately following lines the term "coasting trade" is not used, but such vessels are described as "employed in the transportation of any of the produce or manufacture of the United States coastwise within the said States." This restriction in the act of July 20, 1789, of the use of the term "coasting trade" to vessels of the United States is consistently followed, so far as I recall, throughout the statutes. The coasting trade is excepted in terms from the operation of most of our treaties with foreign nations.

There is no specific prohibition in the statutes against a foreign vessel engaging in the coasting trade, and none is needed. Employment in the coasting trade of the United States is a privilege, if not bestowed, at least regulated by act of Congress, and the possession of the privilege is evidenced by the license or, as indicated, the American register. Those vessels which seek to share in that trade without this evidence are unlawfully employed and have always been subject to penalties.

TOLLS EVADED.

You realize from this situation, that the law now on the books will be evaded and that the provision granting free tolls in the coastwise trade will be misused by unscrupulous men to avoid payment to the Treasury of what is justly due, and which this Congress and the country believe should be justly paid. It will practically be the means of dodging canal dues on foreign traffic from Europe to the Pacific States and the Orient, and from the Orient to the Atlantic States and Europe. It would also encourage evasions at Colon and Panama under the guise of being coastwise trade. The looseness of our existing laws enables such dodging of tolls against the canal treasury and, at the same time, a palpable discrimination against competing traffic which attempts to be honest with our Government and pay its tolls, as its fair share of the expense of the great canal.

DISCRIMINATION IN PRODUCTS.

Again, the Pacific coast is a great consuming portion of our country. It is rapidly building up in every line of activity, and they require a large volume of products for construction, iron and steel and other like material. You gentlemen on the other side passed what you called a competitive tariff, encouraging foreigners to compete in our markets in this very kind of material. I presume you intended that in places like that, there should be real competition between the goods of this country and the corresponding competitive goods from Europe. The iron and steel which would go to San Francisco or Los Angeles or Seattle or Portland or Tacoma from our country would not pay tolls; that which could go directly from England, Germany, Belgium, and France would pay tolls. That is a discrimination against that foreign traffic, and nobody can deny it.

Lumber and fish are produced on our North Pacific coast, and similar products are produced just across the line in Canada. Eastern markets will greedily take all which can be sent there. These products from our country would reach the eastern markets through the canal free of tolls, their competing products, across the line from Canada, would reach the same markets paying tolls; that is discrimination against that traffic. Yet, again, Hawaii produces a large amount of raw cane sugar, which must be refined in the great refineries at New York or Philadelphia. This sugar would reach the refiners free from tolls, while the competing raw sugar from Mexico, Central American States, and Peru would reach the same refiners after paying tolls through the canal. This is clear discrimination against that traffic. Numerous similar instances can be brought to mind, showing clearly that free tolls for our coastwise trade through the canal, would only be the means of evasion and discrimination in favor of the large producers and shippers on our side, as against the small producers outside who may happen to compete. This discrimination is expressly forbidden by the terms of the Panama Canal act. These foreign goods, traffic, and citizens can clearly engage in our coastwise trade. If they happen to use an American vessel, they pass the canal free from tolls; if they use other vessels, they pay tolls. When this is once clearly understood, no longer can the argument be made that the coastwise trade is confined under the existing law to our own people. It is not. Only a part of the trade and traffic from one port to another in the United States is confined to American. The vast majority of coastwise business is open to foreigners exactly as it is to our own people. This vast business is prohibited being treated by us with any discrimination under the treaty.

EXCLUSIVE COASTWISE TRADE.

My friend from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH] asks if we can pass a law which will confine our coastwise trade entirely to our own vessels, and England intimated that in one of its notes; and I can readily perceive why England would like to have that done. There is no doubt that we can do it in such a way. The present law provides that documented and enrolled vessels shall engage exclusively in the coastwise trade. Of course, registered vessels for foreign trade can also do that. But documented and enrolled vessels must engage in coastwise trade exclusively and do nothing else. If they engage in any foreign trade at all, even taking on a box of cigars en route, both the vessel and cargo are subject to forfeiture. I have no doubt my friend had such a condition in mind. That is the law to-day and has been since 1783. But let us see how it would work, and if the gentleman would vote for it as applied to the Panama Canal. If we provided that such a vessel should then start from San Francisco and not be allowed to touch at any place en route, at any Mexican, Central, or South American port, and on such condition only get through the canal free of tolls, we would run directly into this surprising and unfortunate situation. When the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce examined this matter, we found that the profit of free tolls on that kind of vessels would exceed the profit which there would be on stopping en route at the little ports in Mexico and Central America; so that if we confined the free tolls to that kind of vessels—the documented and enrolled, engaged exclusively in coastwise trade—such vessels would not stop en route but would proceed straight through. The result would be that all coastwise vessels would not stop en route, while the registered vessels would not find sufficient profit to enter that small business, so we would thus abandon that entire commerce on the western coast between Mexico, Central America, and the United States. In other words, free tolls to exclusively coastwise vessels, would mean that we would give subsidies to coastwise vessels for the sake of abandoning the commerce between the United States and the nations to the south of us along the western coast. We decided that would not be good policy and so rejected the word "exclusively," and I think every one of you will agree with our view.

USE OF CANAL.

Now, it is argued, and strongly, that because we have spent $400,000,000 in the construction of this canal and must defend and maintain it, that it is ours and we ought to have the right to do with it as we please, and prefer and discriminate in favor of our own people. Consider what that argument really means. We went upon that great world highway between the oceans, knowing well the rights and interests of all nations in it. We knew and loudly claimed for many years that this was a great international highway, and that we should insist upon our rights of equal treatment in its use. We said so for 50 years before we undertook its construction. When we actually undertook the construction of that highway, we entered into an engagement with the nation which owned the land over which it passed, and promised that it should continue to be a highway for equal use of all nations. We said so in pledges to the world; we said so in express terms to the nation which granted us the land for the highway. In the very instrument of grant, the treaty with Panama, by which the Canal Zone was ceded to us for use as a canal, among other things two were especially required by Panama, one that her own public vessels should use the canal free from tolls, and, second, that all vessels of all nations should be equally treated, and that there should be no discrimination to or for any traffic of any nation. These are express conditions of the grant by which we acquired the Canal Zone.

Senator Davis, in his great report, well said that—

> Our Government or our people will furnish the money to build the canal presents the single question whether it is profitable to do so. If the canal, as property, is worth more than its cost we are not called on to divide the profits with other nations. If it is worth less and we are compelled by national necessities to build the canal, we have no right to call on other nations to make up the loss to us. In any view it is a venture that we will enter upon if it is to our interest, and if it is otherwise we will withdraw from its further consideration.

The American people are an honest people; they are a true people; they are not shifty; they mean to keep the faith. When we commenced that great undertaking we knew what we were about to do. We went into it with our eyes wide open, and agreed with the world, and especially our neighbors, as to our intention; and now that it is finished, do the American people mean to say that because we want it, because we are big and it is big, we will do as we please regardless of the promises in the past? [Applause.]

SOVEREIGNTY OF ZONE.

There is one argument made by my friend from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] yesterday which deserves some consideration. He took to task the report of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which contained a statement as to the limited sovereignty of the Canal Zone. He maintained that we have the absolute right of ownership and of sovereignty, while the committee report maintains that we have only the right of a limited and qualified sovereignty. The very language, as he read it, would indicate that the committee was right and that he was wrong. I will use the language of another here:

The suggestion has been made that we are relieved from the obligations of our treaties with Great Britain because the Canal Zone is our territory. It is said that, because it has become ours, we are entitled to build the canal on our own territory and do what we please with it. Nothing can be further from the fact. It is not our territory, except in trust. Article 2 of the treaty with Panama provides:

"The Republic of Panama grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of a zone of land and land under water for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of said canal"—

And for no other purpose—

"of the width of 10 miles extending to the distance of 5 miles on each side of the center line of the route of the canal to be constructed.

* * * * * * *

"The Republic of Panama further grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of any other lands and waters outside of the zone above described which may be necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said canal or of any auxiliary canals or other works necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said enterprise."

Article 3 provides:

"The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the rights, power, and authority within the zone mentioned and described in article 2 of this agreement"—from which I have just read—"and within the limits of all auxiliary lands and waters mentioned and described in said article 2 which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, powers, or authority."

Article 5 provides:

"The Republic of Panama grants to the United States in perpetuity a monopoly for the construction, maintenance, and operation of any system of communication by means of canal or railroad across its territory between the Caribbean Sea and the Pacific Ocean."

I now read from article 18:

"The canal, when constructed, and the entrances thereto shall be neutral in perpetuity, and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by section 1 of article 3 of, and in conformity with all the stipulations of, the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901."

So, Mr. President, far from our being relieved of the obligations of the treaty with Great Britain by reason of the title that we have obtained to the Canal Zone, we have taken that title impressed with a solemn trust. We have taken it for no purpose except the construction and maintenance of a canal in accordance with all the stipulations of our treaty with Great Britain. We can not be false to those stipulations without adding to the breach of contract a breach of the trust which we have assumed, according to our own declarations, for the benefit of mankind as the mandatory of civilization.

The gentleman from Alabama read one provision of the treaty, but not with that interpretation.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman means the Panama treaty; he did not say so to the House.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; these are articles from the Panama treaty. I am glad that the gentleman made it clear. These sections are the very basis of our grant and right to the zone itself, and clearly show that we have only a right of limited and qualified sovereignty, in trust only for a specific purpose. We took and hold the land in trust for the specific purpose stated in the deed of trust, the treaty with Panama. We have no rights outside of it. Again, the plain terms of our own statutes of June 28, 1902, and April 28, 1904, relative to acquiring the zone, provided only for "possession and control," and not for the absolute title.

Let me call to your attention some plain facts, so that you can see yourselves how entirely wrong he was. Suppose we should abandon the canal, to whom would the zone belong? To Panama, of course. No one could pretend to the contrary. If we shall lease the canal, or transfer the canal to anybody else, we should get the consent of Panama, because, as ex-President Taft well stated, it had a shadow of sovereignty. If we wish to use it for any governmental purpose not connected with the canal, for instance, to establish a penal colony or a leper colony on it, we would be obliged to have the consent of Panama for that purpose if we wish to treat our neighboring nations fairly, as we demand they shall treat us. Now, how idle it is and what nonsense it is for gentlemen of the standing of the gentleman from Alabama, to state that we have absolute sovereignty over that zone. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was right. [Applause.]

VESSELS OF WAR.

Many good citizens and some very able men, for whom I have the greatest respect, insist that vessels of commerce and vessels of war of the United States are on equal terms under these treaties in the use of the canal, and that if we include one class necessarily we include the other, and if one class be excluded necessarily we exclude the other. The gentleman from Mississippi and the gentleman from Alabama both made such contention. My judgment is clearly to the contrary.

If the gentlemen would read the history of these treaties and the negotiations concerning them, they would no longer make that statement. Secretary Hay, in his memorandum to the Senate when the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty was forwarded, made this statement (S. Doc. No. 746, 61st Cong., 3d sess.). I will read it to you:

Third. The next important change from the former treaty consists in the omission of the words "in time of war as in time of peace" from clause 1 of article 3. No longer insisting upon the language of the Davis amendment, which had in terms reserved to the United States express permission to disregard the rules of neutrality prescribed when necessary to secure its own defense, which the Senate had apparently deemed necessary because of the provision in rule 1, that the canal should be free and open "in time of war as in time of peace" to the vessels of all nations, it was considered that the omission of the words "in time of war as in time of peace" would dispense with the necessity of the amendment referred to, and that war between the contracting parties, or between the United States and any other power, would have the ordinary effect of war upon treaties when not specially otherwise provided, and would remit both parties to their original and natural right of self-defense and give to the United States the clear right to close the canal against the other belligerent, and to protect it and defend itself by whatever means might be necessary.

Fourth. In conformity with the Senate's emphatic rejection of article 8 of the former treaty, which provided that the high contracting parties would, immediately upon the exchange of ratifications, bring it to the notice of other powers and invite them to adhere to it, no such provision was inserted in the draft of the new treaty.

It was believed that the declaration that the canal should be free and open to all nations on terms of entire equality (now that Great Britain was relieved of all responsibility and obligation to enforce and defend its neutrality) would practically meet the force of the objection which had been made by Lord Lansdowne to the Senate's excision of the article inviting the other powers to come in, viz, that Great Britain was placed thereby in a worse position than other nations in case of war with the United States.

Fifth. The next change from the former treaty is the omission of the provision in clause 7 of article 3, which prohibited the fortification of the canal, and the transfer to clause 2 of the remaining provision of clause 7, that the United States shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

The whole theory of the treaty is that the canal is to be an entirely American canal. The enormous cost of constructing it is to be borne by the United States alone. When constructed, it is to be exclusively the property of the United States and is to be managed, controlled, and defended by it. Under these circumstances, and considering that now by the new treaty Great Britain is relieved of all the responsibility and burden of maintaining its neutrality and security, it was thought entirely fair to omit the prohibition that "no fortification shall be erected commanding the canal or the waters adjacent."

Sixth. It will be observed that, although the words "in time of war as in time of peace" had been omitted from clause 1 of article 3 upon the theory that the omission of these words would dispense with the necessity of the Davis amendment, and that war between the United States and any other power would have the ordinary effect of war upon treaties and remit both parties to their natural right of self-defense—the same words are retained in the sixth clause of article 3, which provides that the plant, establishment, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed part of it for the purposes of this treaty, and "in time of war as in time of peace" shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness.

It was considered that such specific provision was in the general interest of commerce and of civilization, and that all nations would regard such a work as sacred under all circumstances.

He writes in another section, that war between the United States and any treaty power would have the ordinary effect of war upon treaties to remit both parties to their natural rights in self-defense. That is stated repeatedly. Secretary Knox stated exactly the same in his note of January 17, 1913, to the American embassy at London, as follows:

It is not believed, however, that in the objection now under consideration Great Britain intends to question the right of the United States to exempt from the payment of tolls its vessels of war and other vessels engaged in the service of this Government. Great Britain does not challenge the right of the United States to protect the canal. United States vessels of war and those employed in Government service are a part of our protective system. By the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we assume the sole responsibility for its neutralization. It is inconceivable that this Government should be required to pay canal tolls for the vessels used for protecting the canal, which we alone must protect. The movement of United States vessels in executing governmental policies of protection are not susceptible of explanation or differentiation. The United States could not be called upon to explain what relation the movement of a particular vessel through the canal has to its protection. The British objection, therefore, is understood as having no relation to the use of the canal by vessels in the service of the United States Government.

Our Secretaries of State have laid that down repeatedly, and Great Britain has admitted our contention in every note that has passed between us. From the note of Sir Edward Grey, dated November 14, 1912, to Secretary Knox:

I notice that in the course of the debate in the Senate on the Panama Canal bill the argument was used by one of the speakers that the third, fourth, and fifth rules embodied in article 3 of the treaty show that the words "all nations" can not include the United States, because if the United States were at war it is impossible to believe that it could be intended to be debarred by the treaty from using its own territory for revictualing its warships or landing troops.

The same point may strike others who read nothing but the text of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty itself, and I think it is therefore worth while that I should briefly show that this argument is not well founded.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 aimed at carrying out the principle of the neutralization of the Panama Canal by subjecting it to the same régime as the Suez Canal. Rules 3, 4, and 5 of article 3 of the treaty are taken almost textually from articles 4, 5, and 6 of the Suez Canal convention of 1888. At the date of the signature of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the territory on which the Isthmian Canal was to be constructed did not belong to the United States; consequently there was no need to insert in the draft treaty provisions corresponding to those in articles 10 and 13 of the Suez Canal convention, which preserve the sovereign rights of Turkey and of Egypt, and stipulate that articles 4 and 5 shall not affect the right of Turkey, as the local sovereign, and of Egypt, within the measure of her autonomy, to take such measures as may be necessary for securing the defense of Egypt and the maintenance of public order, and, in the case of Turkey, the defense of her possessions on the Red Sea.

Now that the United States has become the practical sovereign of the canal, HIS MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT DO NOT QUESTION ITS TITLE TO EXERCISE BELLIGERENT RIGHTS FOR ITS PROTECTION.

For these reasons His Majesty's Government maintain that the words "all nations" in rule 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty include the United States, and that in consequence British vessels using the canal are entitled to equal treatment with those of the United States, and that the same tolls are chargeable on each.

Ambassador Bryce, in his final note to Secretary Knox, of February 27, 1913, took no issue with the declaration of Secretary Knox as to the rights of the United States in the use of its public and war vessels, and so impliedly admitted the full contention in this respect of Secretary Knox.

There are only two nations which have contract rights as to the canal—Great Britain and Panama—and both have yielded to this contention, so that in time of war we have just the same rights which we have over every inch of the territory of the United States.

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. I notice a quotation from the Hay memorandum expressing that in time of war the United States would revert to the original right of self-defense. Does not the memorandum of Lord Lansdowne in 1901 express the contrary view?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; I think the gentleman is mistaken. I will place in the RECORD what I conceive to be Lord Lansdowne's contention.

Mr. TEMPLE. I would rather that the gentleman would put in what Lord Lansdowne actually said.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I shall put in the RECORD exactly what he said, and I trust the gentleman will follow it and see that I do it correctly.

I here insert the pertinent statements in the note of Lord Lansdowne, the British foreign minister, in his note of August 3, 1901, to Secretary Hay relative to the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty, the one we are now discussing. This is the most authoritative expression of the British foreign office, at the time the present treaty was under discussion and ratification:

(2) The reservation to the United States of the right to take any measures which it might find necessary to secure by its own forces the defense of the United States appeared to His Majesty's Government to involve a distinct departure from the principle of neutralization which until then had found acceptance with both Governments, and which both were, under the convention of 1900, bound to uphold. Moreover, if the amendment were added, the obligation to respect the neutrality of the canal in all circumstances would, so far as Great Britain was concerned, remain in force; the obligation of the United States, on the other hand, would be essentially modified. The result would be a one-sided arrangement, under which Great Britain would be debarred from any warlike action in or around the canal, while the United States would be able to resort to such action even in time of peace to whatever extent they might deem necessary to secure their own safety.

(3) The omission of the article inviting the adherence of other powers placed this country in a position of marked disadvantage compared with other powers; while the United States would have a treaty right to interfere with the canal in time of war, or apprehend in war, and while other powers could with a clear conscience disregard any of the restrictions imposed by the convention of 1900, Great Britain alone would be absolutely precluded from resorting to any such action or from taking measures to secure her interests in and near the canal.

For these reasons His Majesty's Government preferred, as matters stood, to retain unmodified the provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer convention. They had, however, throughout the negotiation given evidence of their earnest desire to meet the views of the United States, and would sincerely regret a failure to come to an amicable understanding in regard to this important subject.

5. In form the new draft differs from the convention of 1900, under which the high contracting parties, after agreeing that the canal might be constructed by the United States, undertook to adopt certain rules as the basis upon which the canal was to be neutralized. In the new draft the United States intimate their readiness "to adopt" somewhat similar rules as the basis of the neutralization of the canal. It would appear to follow that the whole responsibility for upholding these rules, and thereby maintaining the neutrality of the canal, would henceforward be assumed by the Government of the United States. The change of form is an important one; but in view of the fact that the whole cost of the construction of the canal is to be borne by that Government, which is also to be charged with such measures as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder, His Majesty's Government are not likely to object to it.

7. The various points connected with the defense of the canal may conveniently be considered together. In the present draft the Senate amendment has been dropped, which left the United States at liberty to apply such measures as might be found "necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States." On the other hand, the words "in time of war as in time of peace" are omitted from rule 1, and there is no stipulation, as originally in rule 7, prohibiting the erection of fortifications commanding the canal or the waters adjacent.

I do not fail to observe the important difference between the question as now presented to us and the position which was created by the amendment adopted in the Senate.

In my dispatch I pointed out the dangerous ambiguity of an instrument of which one clause permitted the adoption of defensive measures while another prohibited the erection of fortifications. It is most important that no doubt should exist as to the intention of the contracting parties.

"As to this, I understand that by the omission of all reference to the matter of defense the United States Government desires to reserve the power of taking measures to protect the canal at any time when the United States may be at war from destruction or damage at the hands of an enemy or enemies. On the other hand, I conclude that, with the above exception, there is no intention to derogate from the principles of neutrality laid down by the rules. As to the first of these propositions, I am not prepared to deny that contingencies may arise when, not only from a national point of view but on behalf of the commercial interests of the whole world, it might be of supreme importance to the United States that they should be free to adopt measures for the defense of the canal at a moment when they were themselves engaged in hostilities.

It is also to be borne in mind that, owing to the omission of the words under which this country became jointly bound to defend the neutrality of the canal, and the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the obligations of Great Britain would be materially diminished.

This is a most important consideration. In my dispatch of the 22d February I dwelt upon the strong objection entertained by His Majesty's Government to any agreement under which, while the United States would have a treaty right to interfere with the canal in time of war or apprehended war, Great Britain alone, in spite of her vast possessions on the American Continent and the extent of her interests in the East, would be absolutely precluded from resorting to any such action or from taking measures to secure her interests in and near the canal.

"The same exceptions could not be taken to an arrangement under which, supposing that the United States, as the power owning the canal and responsible for the maintenance of its neutrality, should find it necessary to interfere temporarily with its free use by the shipping of another power, that power would thereupon at once and ipso facto become liberated from the necessity of observing the rules laid down in the new treaty."

POLICE POWERS.

As to police powers in time of peace, the treaty itself covers that; that the United States shall police the canal, and to do that satisfactorily our Government shall use its ships in any way it may deem necessary. Secretary Knox stated that clearly and forcibly. That most eminent authority, Senator Davis, in his report stated that to accomplish that, it might be necessary to have naval stations scattered as far as Manila on one side and through the West Indies on the other. Admiral Dewey stated his views, which were included in that report, to the same effect as Senator Davis. Indeed, it is probable that the views of Senator Davis were taken from those of Admiral Dewey.

I have a letter also from Admiral Chester, of our Navy, one of the most eminent authorities on international law in the Navy and in this country, and he makes exactly that same statement—that under section 2 of article 3 we have a right to pass our war vessels any way we please in time of peace, for the purpose of both defending and policing, so that no question can be raised either in time of war or in time of peace, but that we can do as we please in the passage of our warships without any possible toll.

1736 K STREET NW.,
Washington, D. C., March 11, 1914.

MY DEAR SIR: I take pleasure in answering at once the inquiries contained in your letter of yesterday as best I can in the short time permitted for a reply.

In my opinion section 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty would clearly call for the payment of tolls on the war vessels of the United States in order to place them "on terms of entire equality" with the war vessels of all other nations if there were no other part of the treaty relating to this matter. Section 2 of the same article, however, provides that "the United States shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder." This includes "the waters adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end." By this clause of the treaty the United States is given a clear hand in using her military forces for the purpose of defending the canal as she may choose, without the payment of tolls or complying with other "rules" laid down for the governance of vessels passing through the canal.

How far this right of exemption from the payment of tolls by the war vessels of the United States may be extended is debatable, but I think it rightly includes all the vessels of the Navy that may use the canal, for it is the custom of all navies, upon meeting foreign men-of-war on the high seas to prepare for defense whether in peace or in war time. It is, moreover, a cardinal principle of naval strategy that "offensive defense" is the best defensive policy to pursue, and this would naturally include any portion of the broad oceans in the field of defensive operation. Perhaps a paragraph I have just written for an article on the Monroe doctrine may explain this broad view of the case, and I quote it as follows:

"Aside from the fact, that 'self-preservation' compels us to take cognizance of political affairs in countries contiguous to our own, we have assumed a responsibility, in behalf of the whole world, in connection with the countries bordering the Caribbean Sea and the Gulf of Mexico which makes our control of these waters imperative. In the treaties recently negotiated between this country and Great Britain and the one with Panama the United States agrees, not only that the American 'canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations,' but guarantees at the same time that 'the canal shall never be blockaded nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.' It is a fact that these stipulations can not be maintained without naval control of the seas to the south of the United States. It is necessary, therefore, that this water space be considered as a part of 'the greater Panama Canal Zone,' and, as far as its protection is concerned, the naval policy of the United States can be the only guide to perfect peace within its limits."

The predominant British interests in the Suez Canal are protected, not by fortifications and a police force on the line of the canal but by fortifications at Gibraltar and the island of Perim at the mouth of the Red Sea, together with a fleet that may be mobilized in any part of the broad oceans.

The United States may similarly be called upon to protect the Panama Canal in any part of the Atlantic or Pacific Oceans or in any water to the canal. For these reasons, I think the United States has a clear right under the treaties to pass her war vessels through the Panama Canal at all times without the payment of tolls.

While, as I have said, this measure may be debatable, there is another phase of the treaty, included in the words "on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation," etc., which I think clearly gives the right of United States war vessels to be exempted from the payment of tolls. That point is this. If the owner of the canal should pay a tariff on his own ships, the Treasury neither gains nor loses in the transaction. He is simply making a transfer of funds or securities from one hand to the other for no purpose whatever and it is a mere formality. There is "no discrimination" against any party if he does not do it and is not therefore a violation of the treaty. If I am not mistaken, this matter is referred to in the protest made by the British Government against the exemption of tolls for coastwise vessels. This communication states, in effect, that technically the United States might be considered as bound to pay tolls for her war vessels, yet her doing so would make no difference in the general result, and therefore there can be no objection on the part of anyone to the American Government's exemption from the payment of tolls on her warships. I regret that I have no copy of the British protest to refer to for more precise data.

There would be a discrimination against foreign vessels if American "vessels of commerce" were exempted from the payment of canal tolls, however, because by their nonpayment of such tolls the owner's total receipts are so much less, and he must charge his paying customers more for the service rendered them to make a paying business of his venture, which is a discrimination in the meaning of the treaties.

I wish that I had more time to study the questions you have asked me, but trust this will answer your purpose for the time being, and that you will call upon me again at any time that I can serve the cause of honest dealing with our neighbors.

Very truly, yours,

C. M. CHESTER.

Hon. F. C. STEVENS, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

OTHER PUBLIC VESSELS.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Let me finish. And as to the other Government vessels, the treaty does not cover them. It covers only vessels of war and commerce, and, of course, as to other Government vessels which are not included within such terms—as revenue cutters, light vessels, supply vessels, Alaska railroad vessels, and so forth—the United States can do as it pleases. I can not see how that can be fairly disputed. I now yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I understand the purpose of the Davis amendment was to make sure of the right of the United States to take care of itself in the event of war?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. What is there in this new treaty, or what is there left out of the new treaty, which does away with the necessity for the Davis amendment?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I read what Secretary Hay said about that in this very language. On page 30 of this last compilation, Document No. 456, Sixty-third Congress, second session, he said—we no longer insist upon the language of the Davis amendment, which had in terms reserved to the United States express provision to disregard the rules of neutrality prescribed when necessary to secure its own defense, which the Senate has apparently deemed necessary because of the provision in rule 1 that the canal should be free and open in time of war as in time of peace to the vessels of all nations. It was considered that the omission of the words "in time of war as in time of peace" would dispense with the necessity of the amendment referred to, and that war between the contracting parties or between the United States or any other power would have the ordinary effect upon all treaties when not specifically otherwise provided, and would remit both parties to their original and natural right of self-defense.

It is the general rule of international law which applies, and that everybody accedes to, which protects the United States in that emergency referred to by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Is not that the very reason that the Senate defeated the Davis amendment, because the Davis amendment was not necessary, and is it not untrue that they defeated that amendment because they wanted to show any consideration for the contention of Great Britain, as the gentleman stated when he first started to speak?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, as usual the gentleman is entirely wrong in his statements. The Davis amendment was not defeated. The Davis amendment was adopted by a vote of 65 to 17, and here is the record.

NEUTRALIZATION AND EQUALITY.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take up too much time, so I will hasten. It is stated that the treaty shall preserve the doctrine of neutralization. Neutralization implies agreement. There can be no neutralization unless there be an agreement on the part of the nations affected that there shall be neutralization, and every agreement of neutralization since the history of man, necessarily has been based on the fact that the nations agreeing shall have fair treatment as between each other. This fair treatment is based necessarily on commercial freedom and equality of opportunity without any discrimination for or against anyone. Neutralization implies equality as to commercial treatment, or there can not be neutralization. So the very basis of neutralization must be that there shall be equality of treatment of merchant vessels in the use of the canal.

Mr. AVIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. AVIS. I notice that in the treaty with Panama in article 19 it is provided that Panama shall have the right to transport through the canal all her vessels without charges whatever. I would like to ask the gentleman how he reconciles that language in that treaty which was made in 1903 with his construction of section 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad the gentleman called my attention to that. The situation was this: When the treaty of 1901 was made—the Hay-Pauncefote treaty—we had not acquired any land at all for the purpose of canal construction. It was practically intended it should operate as to Nicaragua, but it never did operate, because Congress instead located the canal at Panama. It was a floating agreement in the air, ready to light upon any suitable land we could secure for that purpose. It did not locate until we made the treaty with Panama. When we made the treaty with Panama that Government, as it had a right to do, exacted, first of all, the condition which the gentleman has stated, that it should pass its public vessels free of tolls and all commerce on equal terms in the use of the canal with us. After we had made that treaty with Panama, providing for free passage of its public vessels and equality for the others, then the Hay-Pauncefote treaty applied, so that whatever rights we obtained from Panama, were the basis upon which the Hay-Pauncefote treaty applied, and the equality provided in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was necessarily based on what was actually acquired by the Panama treaty. Its reservation deducted that much. The legal effect clearly is that the rights of Panama were not granted to it by us in their treaty, but were expressly reserved by Panama from us as a condition of making the treaty. Panama granted our canal rights, except that it saved for itself the right to pass its public vessels free of toll and all merchant vessels on an equality. That is the logical and safe and sound doctrine in all such matters.

COLOMBIA.

More than that, in this connection, we made a subsequent treaty with Colombia concerning the Canal Zone, in which occurred exactly that same provision, that Colombian public vessels should have free passage and merchant vessels should have the right of equal treatment. It was based on a contention that Colombia might have a shadow of a title to the land which it could reserve and in which it could claim some right. But I understand that as to the latter treaty, the records of our State Department show that in order to be absolutely sure that we had not violated the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote and Panama treaties we obtained, in express terms, the waiver of Great Britain of any objection to the Hay-Herran treaty with Colombia, so that the gentleman has called attention to facts which vitally strengthen what we have been contending, that in the handling of these matters we always have observed the equality between all nations in the rights of commerce under these treaties. But that as to the public vessels of Panama, Colombia, and the United States there are rules, clearly understood and applicable, which could pass free of tolls the vessels of these sovereigns on public business. Of course the same rights would apply to the nations described in section 6 of the act of 1902.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. In the British note they claim we do not have the right to pass the Panama ships through without the payment of tolls.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That makes no difference.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Then the gentleman does not agree with Great Britain upon all her contentions?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; not at all. I believe in the American doctrine, both as to war and merchant vessels, which has been in force in this country for more than 120 years. It does not make any difference where it is applicable; it is sound and safe, and protects both our prosperity and our honor. I have not changed overnight. [Applause.]

Mr. LAFFERTY. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I do, but I realize my time is passing.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I want to see whether I am always wrong or not. Was not there an amendment offered in the Senate, called the Bard amendment, that expressly exempted coastwise vessels, and was it not voted down because under the treaty Senator Davis, in his opinion, said that commerce would be exempted?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. In the first place, Senator Davis had been dead about a year and a half. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAFFERTY. But did not he make the statement originally?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will answer the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The Chair admonishes Members that it is against the rules to sit in their seats and inject remarks into another gentleman's speech.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will answer the gentleman in all fairness.

Mr. LAFFERTY. The question I desire to ask the gentleman, if he will permit, is if Senator Davis's position was not on record in his report, even if he had been dead a year and a half, and that was referred to where he said coastwise vessels should be exempt?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I have already said, and I again promise, that I will put everything Senator Davis said bearing on the question in the RECORD so the gentleman can see for himself. Just the contrary to the gentleman's understanding is true.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Will the gentleman admit that in this treaty——

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Which treaty?

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. This Hay-Pauncefote treaty, that the United States would have the right of exempting its ships from tolls? Will the gentleman admit that much?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I said at the start we have the right to do what we please except where we bound ourselves otherwise. Of course the gentleman understands that I have already said that I am not trying to discuss the treaty.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. That being so, when the treaty says "all nations governed by these rules and general treaties," then it means that the United States is also governed by these rules. Is that correct?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Then will the gentleman answer this question? If the United States is governed by these rules and these rules say:

> Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary—
> And so forth.
> No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal—
> And so forth.
> Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress—
> And so forth.

That that applies, then, to the United States, I ask if the United States is governed by these rules?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. It does except in time of war, and then the treaty ceases.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Could there be a belligerent in time of peace?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. This refers to belligerency against others, not the United States, where the United States must defend the canal from the misdeeds of others. The gentleman ought to know that in time of war in which the United States is engaged, the treaty ceases to operate, and this provision ceases to operate. Let me call the attention of the gentleman to one provision that he unfortunately overlooked, and that is that there is one section in this article 3 which clearly states it does operate and is effective in time of war, because it expressly says so, and if you look at the last section 6 of that article 3 it is made plain that that does operate in time of war by the United States, and it is the only one of the whole six which does. I will insert this section, which shows on its face it is the only one which would be effective in a war in which the United States itself is engaged. The others refer to wars in which the United States is clearly not engaged.

Hay-Pauncefote treaty, section 6, article 3:

> The plant, establishment, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as a part of the canal.

In this connection I think the views expressed by my colleague, Hon. HALVOR STEENERSON, on this subject, on page 6226 of the RECORD of March 30, 1914, are entirely sound. In substance, they are:

> That the rule of construction applicable to this clause of the treaty is as follows: Where a statute is general, and thereby any prerogative, right, title, or interest is vested, or taken from the King, in such case he shall not be bound unless such is made by expressed words to extend to him.

Mr. STEENERSON clearly shows the application to the sovereignty of the United States under this treaty. That there is a clear distinction running through all of our statutes between vessels of the United States belonging to our citizens and those belonging to the Government of the United States itself used for its own public purposes. The latter are not covered by the treaty unless expressly so provided. The treaty is made entirely for the vessels of our citizens. This universal doctrine is sound and constantly applied in the construction of our own statutes. By itself, this doctrine would exempt the vessels of the sovereign power of the United States when used for public purposes from the scope of section 1, article 3, of the treaty, and would as clearly include the merchant vessels of commerce of our citizens within the scope and agreements of the treaty, and there is no sense or law in requiring taking funds from one pocket and putting into the other.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. RAGSDALE. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] yesterday in discussing this on the floor of the Senate was asked this question by Senator CHAMBERLAIN:

> Does the Senator think we are compelled, under the terms of the clause of the treaty he has just read, to admit the war vessels of Japan and of the United States to the canal under the same terms that we admit our own vessels?

And the answer was, "I do." Does the gentleman agree with the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Not at all. I do not believe the gentleman realized what he was saying when he made that statement.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Has a treaty any greater force or effect than an act of Congress when it comes to the control and regulation of our internal commerce?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. So that an act of Congress has just as much power and force as a treaty when we are regulating our coastwise trade; that if a treaty undertook to deprive this country or this Congress from passing a law that would affect our coastwise trade it would be null and void?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Oh, I do not think the gentleman realizes the situation. The gentleman did not realize my opening statement. Congress does not attempt to violate any treaty, and therefore——

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Let me modify that a little. While I did not mean null and void, I meant that the treaty would remain in force only so long as Congress did not take action upon it, and that when the Congress made up its mind that the treaty was attempting to regulate our internal commerce or attempting to regulate our coastwise trade and was against the best interests of the United States, that Congress could step in?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I did not yield for a speech, but I will gladly answer my friend. In this country the rule is that a treaty and statute are on the same basis, and that in case of a conflict between them the latest shall be effective. In this matter before the House, the two treaties—the Hay-Pauncefote and the Panama treaties—provided for equal treatment for all vessels and no discrimination as to traffic. This was the law as to this country until the enactment of the canal bill on August 24, 1912, when this statute exempted our coastwise vessels from such provisions. Of course, the last decision of Congress must prevail and be enforced in the management of the canal. But at the same time, it violates the provisions of the two earlier treaties requiring equality and forbidding discrimination. There is no redress in our courts for this violation, because it is a political question, and Congress is supreme. But the other nations call attention to this violation, and ask for an arbitration of this action as to its interference with the treaties. It is in our power to do as we please. But we should please to do right and exactly as we agreed.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut rises to a question of order. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman can not take the floor except by way of the Speaker. He can not interrupt the gentleman who is addressing us.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] yielded to his colleague. That being the case, the Speaker has no control over it.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yielded to a question, but I am admonished that my time is more than up, and I do not wish to trespass.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman yield to one question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. Suppose Great Britain and Germany are in war, with which we have not anything to do, would Great Britain and Germany under this treaty be regarded as belligerents?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. They would. That is exactly what the term "belligerents" means in these treaties.

Mr. FESS. And a vessel of either country going into the canal must obey these rules?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Just as we went through the Suez Canal during the Spanish War.

Mr. FESS. Now, suppose we were in war with Great Britain; would we be violating the terms of this treaty if we would close the canal to Great Britain and not allow her vessels to go through?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No. Great Britain has stated herself that we would not—in her own notes.

Mr. FESS. We would not be offending all the Governments of the world and running the risk of the concerted powers against us?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That would be within our treaty rights, as admitted by Great Britain in this exchange of notes.

Now, coming to the last point, and I desire to close.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I want to ask the gentleman if he would favor submitting this to arbitration?

ARBITRATION.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I was just coming to that, if the gentleman will allow me. Of course, upon this question there are three alternatives which are presented to the House, namely, first, doing as we are proceeding to do by this measure before us—repeal the offending provision; second, submitting the differences to arbitration, as stated by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH] and as requested in the notes of Great Britain; and, third, refuse to repeal or to arbitrate, as so many have urged, on one pretext or another. It seems to me the proper thing to do is to repeal this offending provision right now [applause], for this reason: If we arbitrate, as I have already stated, I believe we are almost certain to lose, because the very report of Senator Davis on the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, the memorandum of Secretary Hay in submitting to the Senate the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty, the proceedings of the Senate itself in the discussion of the two treaties, among other things, lay down so clearly and unmistakably the doctrine, that this treaty was intended to apply equally and alike to all commerce, without discrimination. Under the rules of every court of our Government, and under the rules of every court in the civilized world, these official facts of record would be the very best evidence and practically conclusive as to the interpretation of this doubtful language. That report and memorandum and Senate documents of themselves, would defeat us in any arbitration in the world. Then, if we arbitrate and shall be defeated, we will then be confronted with the same proposition as now, and the same objections will be urged and the same popular passions will be aroused.

BETTER REPEAL.

That is why I am opposed to arbitration now, because it is certain we would lose, and so I think the best thing to do is to repeal. It will give us a better standing among the nations and especially make us better respect ourselves by doing what is right and as we have agreed, when not forced to do so. If we can not repeal, of course we should arbitrate, if we are honest and true to our pledges, traditions, and history. If we do not arbitrate, then consider what condition we would be in. It would mean that deliberately we have abandoned the policy of arbitration for the settlement of peaceful disputes, where heretofore we have assumed the leadership among the nations of the world, for nearly half a century. We have urged, in season and out of season, a policy of arbitration among the nations. If we refuse to arbitrate now, we abandon that leadership and reverse ourselves on that most important traditional national policy, and disgrace our pledges and professions before the world. More than that, if we refuse to arbitrate, it means that every nation in the world will hereafter construe its treaties against us as we are now construing this treaty against them. If they construe their treaties against us and refuse to arbitrate, as we may refuse to arbitrate, it means that every treaty of commerce practically fails from that moment, so far as our Nation and our people are concerned. It means that our commerce abroad, more than $4,500,000,000 annually, and rapidly increasing; it means our property abroad, amounting to more than two to three thousands of millions of dollars, will be helpless and unprotected, because our Government can do nothing, since no other Government need pay attention to our demands except at the point of war. That would be unthinkable on that basis. Yet that is the situation we are in. Which shall we do—repeal now, as we should; arbitrate, if we must, with sure defeat and humiliation; or refuse to arbitrate and become an outcast and an outlaw among the nations of the earth? [Applause.]

DISCUSSION OF TREATIES.

During the debate, time did not allow a discussion of the rights, conditions, and obligations of the United States concerning the operation and management of the canal under its two treaties with Great Britain and Panama. I will briefly point out some considerations as to the history and the proper interpretation of these treaties.

No fair or sensible man desires to have his Government deliberately violate its solemn obligations and pledges to the other nations, concerning the use of the Panama Canal. But honest and intelligent men may fairly and justly differ as to what such agreements and pledges actually are. These I will discuss and place of record as concisely and clearly as possible.

In this investigation, and in the interpretation of these treaties, there must be adopted the ordinary fair and just rules which have for many years, and among all civilized nations, been used for such purposes; and which would be applied to all other treaties as well as to these, to all other nations as well as to our own, and to all occasions when the interest of our Nation and people would be best served by the rule adopted, as well as when they would seem to be injured by such rules. These rules should bear impartially upon all, and at all times, and be so fair and reasonable and just as to receive the common acceptation of civilized mankind. We can not afford to follow any other course, at the inception of this great enterprise. But we should endeavor to find out exactly what the situation is and construe in our own favor whatever we fairly and justly can, with the object always to advance all the interests of our own people and seek the just advantage of our own Nation as much as we possibly can do, and as much as should be decently done.

We must realize always that the rule which we may insist upon in this situation, will most certainly be invoked hereafter in other situations and controversies. We must be willing to do in this case, as we might be willing to have done hereafter in any other case, in which we might be involved.

It is a general principle of construction with respect to treaties that they shall be liberally construed, so as to carry out the apparent intentions of the parties to secure equality and reciprocity between them. As they are contracts between independent nations, in their construction words are to be taken in their ordinary meaning as understood in the public law of nations, and not in any artificial or special sense impressed upon them by local law, unless such restricted sense is clearly intended. And it has been held by this court that where a treaty admits of two constructions, one restrictive of rights that may be claimed under it and the other favorable to them, the latter is to be preferred.

United States v. Anguisola (1 Wall., 352).

The reason of the law or of the treaty—that is to say, the motive which leads to the making of it and the object in contemplation at the time—is the most certain clue to lead us to the discovery of its true meaning; and great attention should be paid to this circumstance whenever there is question either of explaining an obscure, ambiguous, indeterminate passage in a law or treaty, or of applying it to a particular case. When once we certainly know the reason which alone has determined the will of the person speaking, we ought to interpret and apply his words in a manner suitable to that reason alone; otherwise he will be made to speak and act contrary to his intention and in opposition to his own views. (Vattel, book 2, chap. 17, sec. 287.)

TREATIES.

The United States has entered into two treaties concerning the use and control of the Panama Canal, which are now in force. The first, with Great Britain, known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, initiated by Secretary of State Hay in 1898, was signed in Washington November 18, 1901, ratified by the Senate December 16, 1901, and proclaimed by the President February 22, 1902.

The second treaty was with Panama, signed at Washington November 18, 1901, ratified by the Senate February 23, 1904, and proclaimed by the President February 26, 1904. This treaty by article 18 provides for the operation of the canal on the terms provided by the treaty with Great Britain, so there is no need to separately discuss its provision.

The section in the treaty with Great Britain which is the center of this controversy, is section 1, article 3, as follows:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

This language is plain on its face, and from its terms there can be no inequality or discrimination in favor of or against any vessels, citizens, traffic, or country, but all must be treated exactly alike, subjected to the same tolls, charges, and conditions, without any distinction.

SOME CONSTRUE DIFFERENTLY.

Apparently clear and plain as is this provision, yet some public officials, many patriotic and intelligent citizens, commercial and public organizations, and an influential portion of our press strongly and sincerely contend that an exception must be implied from this plain and clear language, by which vessels of the United States can be authorized to have free or discriminating tolls in their use of this canal.

The reasons for such exception are substantially three: First, because the words "all nations" do not include the United States, and were not intended to include the United States, and should be construed as though they read "all other nations," and so consequently the vessels of its citizens and under its flag need not be treated under the rules of section 1, article 3; second, that even if the United States be regarded as within the term of "all nations," and its vessels in the foreign trade be necessarily treated on the same terms with their competitors in the foreign trade, yet the vessels in the coastwise trade in the United States are necessarily excepted by implication from the provisions of the treaty, for the reason that they constitute a peculiar class under the laws of the United States, by having a monopoly in our coastwise trade to the exclusion of all foreign vessels, and so do not come within the rules provided by this section; third, it is urged that under the provisions of article 2 of the treaty, the United States may have all the rights incident to the construction of the canal and the exclusive right of regulation and management of it. And in the making of such rules and regulations, that discrimination can be shown to domestic vessels and trade.

RULES AND REGULATIONS NOT ADEQUATE.

This argument is not seriously considered by intelligent students, because such regulations and management must be by the very terms of the same article, "subject to the provisions of the present treaty," which includes the section above cited. If this section allows such discriminating rules, they can be made to favor our own domestic commerce. If that section does not allow any such preference, then they can not be fairly adopted.

HISTORY OF TREATIES.

The history which bears upon the negotiations for these treaties is, briefly, as follows:

After the Mexican War, it became manifest that the United States must consider improved means of communication between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, and that the most practicable would be a ship canal somewhere through the Isthmus. At the same time Great Britain had its possessions upon the two coasts and practically controlled the Caribbean Sea. It also had a protectorate over the Mosquito coast, a long stretch of territory upon the eastern shore of Central America, which controlled the entrance to the route of the Nicaragua Canal. Accordingly in 1850 the United States sought a treaty, popularly known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, by which Great Britain agreed with the United States that neither Government should "ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the ship canal"; that neither would "make use of any protection" which either afforded to a canal "or any alliance which either" might have "with any State or people for the purpose of erecting or maintaining any fortifications, or of occupying, fortifying, or colonizing Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America, or of assuming or exercising dominion over the same," and that neither would "take advantage of any intimacy, or use any alliance, connection, or influence that either" might "possess with any State or Government through whose territory the said canal may pass, for the purpose of acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one, any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal, which shall not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other."

Under these provisions the United States gave up nothing that it then had, and its obligations looked solely to the future. Great Britain gave up its rights under the protectorate over the Mosquito coast, which was supposed to be the eastern terminus of the canal.

In the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty the parties agreed:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

This is an explicit agreement for equality of treatment to the citizens of the United States and to the citizens of Great Britain in any canal, wherever it may be constructed, across the Isthmus. That was the fundamental principle embodied in the treaty of 1850. For 50 years this treaty continued in force, although several times the United States sought to obtain a modification, so that it alone could own and control an isthmian canal. Accordingly, in 1898, after the Spanish War, Secretary John Hay commenced negotiations for a modification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, so that the United States could solely construct and control an isthmian canal.

NEGOTIATIONS FOR HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

In the construction of the controverted clauses of any document, it is always of prime importance to know exactly what the framers themselves intended by the language which is subject to dispute; and when they have set forth their own ideas as to its intention and meaning and have given good reasons for it, usually such facts have been conclusive as to the construction, whenever the language has fairly allowed.

The negotiations for the modification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and for the framing of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty were commenced by Secretary of State John Hay by a letter, December 7, 1898, to Hon. Henry White, chargé at London, and the reply of Mr. White, of date December 22, 1898. These letters are described in Third Moore, Digest International Law, page 210, note A. Another letter of Mr. White, of January 4, 1899, also refers to the same subject.

CONDITION FOR EQUALITY.

From these letters it appears in at least three different places, that the first and necessary condition of a treaty must be that all merchant vessels of all nations must receive in the use of the canal, the same terms and treatment as American vessels. This condition was emphasized more than any other one provision, and descriptive references were forwarded to make it clear that such clause must include all private vessels of all classes, foreign and coastwise, so there could be no mistake about the meaning of any language in the treaty.

Secretary Hay and our Government readily agreed to such condition, and nobody objected to it, because it has always been the consistent, continuous, and historic policy of our Government for more than 50 years to do that identical thing. Practically the only exceptions are the Nicaraguan and the Mexican treaties.

TREATY SO PREPARED.

So Secretary Hay, with the approval of President McKinley and the proper officials of the United States, prepared the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and submitted it to Great Britain. In it were placed the clauses, heretofore referred to, maintaining the general principle of "equality and neutrality," and expressly setting forth in as clear and explicit language as possible "that the vessels of commerce and war of all nations should be treated on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation, its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise." Not a hint of any exception for our commerce, or any other exception; but on the contrary, the correspondence showed that all officials intended clearly and beyond question that "all vessels, commerce, and citizens must be treated exactly alike."

Surely this preliminary history, these negotiations, the language itself, the preamble, and then the proclamation, in terms following and adopting the language, should be sufficient to show that no ambiguity or implication of any other meaning could possibly exist. In ordinary cases it would be sufficient, and no further question could be raised. But one additional fact still further reenforces this history and construction.

At that time the ambassador of the United States to Great Britain was the Hon. Joseph H. Choate. He was absent at the time the negotiations were commenced, but returned, and was the main agent of our Government in the framing of the present treaty. In a recent address he has stated emphatically his own recollections and understanding of the occurrences at that time.

REMARKS OF THE HON. JOSEPH H. CHOATE BEFORE THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF NEW YORK FEBRUARY 13, 1913.

Mr. President and gentlemen, I come here to-day as a member of the chamber of commerce, hoping to help it to decide right in the matter that is now before it, because I consider a wrong decision would be not only a serious blow to the good name and honor of the chamber of commerce but of the country itself.

It is true that I had something to do with the negotiation of this treaty. In the summer of 1901—you will remember that this treaty was ratified by the Senate in November, 1901—I was in England until October and was in almost daily contact with Lord Pauncefote, who on his side represented Lord Lansdowne, the foreign secretary, and was also in very frequent correspondence with Mr. Hay, our Secretary of State, under whom I was acting. As the lips of both of those diplomatists and great patriots, who were each true to his own country and each regardful of the rights of the other, are sealed in death, I think it is quite proper that I should say what I believe both of them, if they were here, would say to-day—that the clause in the Panama Canal bill exempting coastwise American shipping from the payment of tolls is in direct violation of the treaty.

I venture to say now that in the whole course of the negotiation of this particular treaty no claim, no suggestion, was made that there should be any exemption of anybody. How could there be in face of the words they agreed upon? Lord Pauncefote and John Hay were singularly honest and truthful men. They knew the meaning of the English language, and when they agreed upon the language of the treaty they carried out the fundamental principle of their whole diplomacy, so far as I know anything about it, and in the six years I was engaged with them their cardinal rule was to mean what they said and to say what they meant.

Only a few weeks ago Hon. Henry White delivered an address in Washington, in which he clearly and strongly affirmed the terms stated in the original note and correspondence, that the intention always existed on the part of all the officials of both Governments, that vessels of commerce of both and all nations should always be treated on terms of entire equality. This would include all trade—foreign and coastwise. Mr. Choate and Mr. White have a more intimate knowledge of the actual transactions than any living men, and their statements should be conclusive with fair and just men.

PROCEEDINGS OF SENATE.

The proceedings in the Senate in the consideration of both of the Hay-Pauncefote treaties strongly substantiate this contention. When the first treaty was before the Senate there was proposed the so-called Davis amendment:

Insert at the end of section 5 of article 2 the following:

"It is agreed, however, that none of the immediately foregoing conditions and stipulations in sections Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of this article shall apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order."

On the question to agree to the amendment it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 65, nays 17.

As I have already shown in these remarks, the substance of this amendment was that because sections 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of Article II were binding upon and obligated the United States, it seemed necessary that the United States should have the right to provide for a defense of the canal. Section 1, which thus obligated the United States directly by the terms of the Davis amendment, is as follows:

1. The canal shall be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise.

Thus it is conclusive that by this vote, the Senate adopted the position that the United States was included within the terms "of all nations."

SECOND TREATY.

An equally conclusive situation is presented in the proceedings in the ratification of the second treaty on December 16, 1901. Mr. Bacon proposed the following amendment:

In the preamble strike out all after the words "United States," in the tenth line, down to and including the word "convention," in line 11. Strike out from article 2, in line 10, the following words: "subject to the provisions of the present treaty." Strike out all of articles 3 and 4.

The question being on this amendment proposed by Senator Bacon, it was determined in the negative, yeas 18 and nays 60. I have already outlined the purpose of this amendment. It seeks to provide that this pending treaty should not limit the power of the United States in any way in the construction or use of the canal. By adopting the Bacon amendment the United States would then be the sole owner, unlimited by the restrictions of articles 3 and 4. By voting down the amendment the Senate clearly intended that the United States should be limited and obligated by the provisions of articles 3 and 4, and thus be included within the terms "of all nations observing these rules." Yet some of those who voted both for the Davis and against the Bacon amendment, that the United States must be included within the terms "of all nations," now state that it was clearly understood at that time that the United States was not to be considered as so included. It remains for these gentlemen to straighten their own recollections or their own record.

BARD AMENDMENT.

Another bit of history in the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty may be of interest.

PROCEEDINGS IN SENATE.

When the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty was before the Senate for ratification on December 13, 1900, the following proceedings appear on page 15, Senate Document No. 85, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session: "On the question to agree to the amendment proposed by Mr. Bard, to wit: Strike out article 3 and substitute the following: 'Article 3. The United States reserves the right in the regulation and management of the canal to discriminate in respect of the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade.'" It was determined in the negative: Yeas, 27; nays, 43.

SENATE REFUSED PREFERENCE.

This would also seem to show conclusively that no such a provision was intended to be in the treaty or could in any way be implied or inferred from its terms, or such an amendment would not be offered. The fact that it was rejected shows the Senate understood such fact, did not want such provision, but desired to preserve and maintain the general principle of "equality and neutrality," so clearly set forth in the report of Senator Davis and the memorandum of Secretary Hay accompanying the submission of the treaty, and in this way preserve the uniform and continuous policy as to the canal for more than 50 years. This action of the Senate was so overwhelming that no attempt was made by anyone to offer such an amendment to the second treaty.

ATTEMPT TO OFFSET.

To explain and offset this conclusive evidence that no discrimination was intended by the Senate or could be had for the coastwise trade, the minority, on page 4 of the minority report, inserted a sentence from a private letter of Senator Bard which states:

When my amendment was under consideration it was generally conceded [the italics are his] by Senators that even without that specific provision the rules of the treaty would not prevent our Government from treating the canal as part of our coast line and consequently could not be construed as a restriction of our interstate commerce, forbidding the discrimination in charges for tolls in favor of our coastwise trade, and this conviction contributed to the defeat of the amendment.

To show how much Senator Bard actually knew about that subject in comparison with the other Senators who had a great interest and knowledge of it, it is only necessary to examine his legislative proposition as it appears from the records of the Senate. Senate Document No. 85, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, page 15, shows the following:

On the question to agree to the amendment proposed by Mr. Bard, to wit, "Strike out article 3 and substitute the following: 'Article 3. The United States reserves the right in the regulation and management of the canal to discriminate in respect of the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in coastwise trade.'"

The text of the treaty shows article 3 of the original treaty to read as follows:

The contracting parties will immediately upon the exchange of the ratifications of this convention bring it to the notice of the other powers and invite them to adhere to it.

So that the amendment was not germane as offered, was not in the right place, was not proposed to the right article or section, and, finally, on the previous day, article 3 had already been stricken out of the treaty on a motion by Senator Foraker. Senate Document No. 85, page 13, above referred to. Yet this evident misinformation, carelessness, and lack of knowledge as to what was actually going on, is offered as a basis for reversing the policy and history of our Nation and violating its solemn pledges to the world. The other Senators who now so vigorously recollect, are shown to have previously voted that the United States was to be included within the term "all nations" without any qualification or exception. Their records and their memories do not seem to agree.

PREAMBLE AND "GENERAL PRINCIPLES."

One of the most important considerations in the construction of this section 1, article 3, as to "equality of treatment without discrimination," and as to whether an exception concerning our coastwise vessels can be implied from it, must be from the language of the preamble of the treaty. This preamble is in terms:

The United States of America and His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, etc., being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th of April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed, etc.

CONSTRUCTION OF PREAMBLE.

It is a fundamental principle of construction of all documents that such a preamble shows first of all the reason for the making and existence of the agreement, document, or act; and secondly, that the language of the document, treaty, and so forth, should be so construed, if reasonably possible, to give effect to such purpose. (Moore, 5 Dig. Int. Law, p. 249.)

Thus it is important to ascertain what is the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which must not be impaired by this treaty. This article 8 has been previously set forth in terms, so need not here be repeated.

It will be noted that the general principle is defined as embracing, first, protection to the canal; second, that the charges therein shall be just and equitable; and third, that it shall be open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, and also shall be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of other nations willing to grant the same protection to the canal as do Great Britain and the United States. Subsequently, by agreement in the second treaty, the protection of the canal was confided and confined to the United States, without substantially changing the other provisions of the "general principle."

SAME AS IN PANAMA TREATY.

These are the same conditions set forth in article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and on their face there can be no possible exception of our commerce. Not only the language of the section, but the very reason for the existence of the preamble, forbids such exception.

The report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs submitting the Hay-Pauncefote treaty clearly shows the true policy and intent of this section in both treaties, and has been set forth at some length.

SECRETARY OLNEY CONSTRUES.

Secretary of State Olney, in 1896, in a memorandum on the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, said (Moore, 3 Dig. Int. Law, p. 207):

As article 8 expressly declares, the contracting parties by the convention desired not only to accomplish a particular object, but to establish a general principle. This general principle is manifested by the provisions of the first seven articles, and is that the interoceanic routes there specified should, under the sovereignty of the States traversed by them, be neutral and free to all nations alike.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY CONSTRUED.

The preceding articles of that treaty, which show the intent and purpose of the general principle, have already been described; and all together conclusively show that the term "general principles" can bear no other construction with reference to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty than requiring "equality of treatment of all vessels, foreign and domestic, coastwise and all," and that there must be no discrimination as to charges or conditions of traffic of any nation, and this must be an integral condition for neutralization of the canal.

CONTINUOUS POLICY OF GOVERNMENT.

This has been the invariable construction of the treaties and of the policy of the United States from the beginning down to the present. There should further be noted the action of our Government in carrying out the "general principle," thus construed and defined in these treaties. President Roosevelt in his message of December 4, 1901, transmitting to the Senate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which was ratified and is now in effect, described it as "a convention without impairing the general principle of neutralization established, etc., in article 8 of that convention." Further, on the 22d day of February, 1902, in the proclamation making such treaty effective, President Roosevelt, in the preamble to it, again sets forth the existence of the "general principle" of neutralization which was to be maintained by such treaty, and in the final statement of the proclamation is found this clause, "to the end that the same and every article and clause thereof may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof."

NOTIFIED WORLD TREATY OBEYED.

Thus the United States Government at once in the proper way, notified the world in the exact language of the treaty itself of its intention to observe and fulfill every article and clause thereof in the exact terms of the treaty itself.

SUEZ CANAL RULES.

It is an elementary rule in the construction of treaties and statutes, that where the provision in question has been copied from those of another nation or state, where such provision has received a careful construction, that such construction would be of great value in considering the proper construction of the borrowed section. In this instance, article 3 of the treaty provides "that the United States adopts as a basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed October 28, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal. That is to say," then follow the six sections laying down the rules of neutralization and equality which shall apply to the Panama Canal.

SUEZ ARTICLES.

The article in the Suez convention relating to charges and tolls is as follows:

ART. 10. The high contracting parties, by application of the principle of equality as regards the free use of the canal (a principle which forms one of the bases of the present treaty), agree that none of them shall endeavor to obtain, with respect to the canal, territorial or commercial advantage or privileges in any international arrangements which may be concluded. Moreover, the rights of Turkey as the territorial power are reserved.

Other sections contain substantially the same provisions as in the other sections of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

CONSTRUCTION OF RULES.

These sections have always been construed to forbid any discrimination at the canal in favor of or against the coastwise vessels or on other trade of any of the contracting nations; and though Great Britain really has the controlling voice in the management and France is the headquarters of the management, yet their vessels pay and are treated exactly the same as all others. Of course, Turkey is specifically excepted. But in the case of the Panama Canal, there was no specific exception, and none can be fairly implied any more than in the case of the Suez Canal.

It is true that some nations do pay specific amounts to their own steamship companies to help defray the tolls and charges at Suez, and some propose to do the same at Panama. This is clearly allowed by the provisions in both treaties, and Secretary Adee, in his argument upon the Canadian controversy, clearly pointed out the difference between the payment of a bounty or a subsidy directly to the vessel, citizen, or traffic from the Public Treasury and that of the remission of tolls to a particular class as an act of favoritism. Each nation can regulate its own policy as to the former method, while as to the latter, the public action would be entirely within the power of one nation. In the payment of subsidies or bounties, each nation determines its own policy for itself. And so all are placed upon an equality, exactly as provided by the treaty must be done. But if one nation controlling the canal, determines to let its own vessels free of tolls for any reason which may seem good to it, at once a gross inequality and discrimination arises which the treaty clearly prohibits. This is the difference between the policies, which is substantial and conclusive, and in all justice ought to be observed, as the United States pledged it would do with reference to this treaty.

Equality can only be obtained by actually compelling all vessels to be treated exactly alike in a physical way, as they pass through the canal.

INCIDENTS OF OWNERSHIP.

Article 2 provides three methods for constructing the canal: First, by the United States itself, at its own cost; second, by individuals or corporations whom the United States might assist by loan or gift of money; third, by individuals or corporations with whom the United States may cooperate through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares. Article 2 is as follows:

ART. 2. It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

Necessarily the rules as to the use of the canal prescribed in section 1, article 3, as to equality, must apply in the same way to all of these methods of construction, and to whichever one of them may be adopted. There is nothing in the treaty indicating any different treatment of American vessels, whether the canal be constructed by private corporations or by the Government itself. This being true, with no provision in the treaty granting any preferential right or privilege, but, on the contrary, the strongest kind of language forbidding it; it must be difficult for any impartial person to fairly contend that a corporation constructing the canal at its own expense, and operating it for a profit, as the Suez Canal was constructed and is operated, can, under these circumstances and conditions, be compelled to give free passage to a large class of vessels possibly yielding a larger profit to their owners, owned by other corporations or interests not named, described, or excepted anywhere in the treaty.

NO REASON FOR EXCEPTION.

It is submitted, that under this treaty any corporation constructing and operating the canal under this provision would not be compelled to relinquish, without consideration, any of its legitimate revenues to another corporation owning and operating American ships in the coastwise trade.

Exactly the same rule must apply to the construction and operation by the United States itself as by a private corporation doing the same thing, because the same language and the same authority and rules apply to both. There can be no exception in one case, unless it can also be an exception in the other.

It can hardly be argued that the United States might exact as a condition of any grant, aid, or subscription that there should be a preference or discrimination to the vessels of commerce of its citizens, because that very thing is expressly forbidden by the broad terms of section 1, article 3, prohibiting any such exception or condition.

STOCKHOLDER WOULD HAVE SAME RIGHT.

Any other stockholder or guarantor could have as much right to exact his own private conditions for his own private advantage, with the result that the enterprise would face ruin from the start. The treaty gives the United States as a stockholder or guarantor no other rights than any other interest also assisting in the enterprise. A British, German, French, or Japanese steamship company might subscribe, own, and hold large blocks of stock or bonds in a corporation provided in section 2, and with equal right under the treaty might demand a preference for its vessels as an exception on account of such ownership. Of course such a demand would be absurd and unjust, and yet equally valid and equitable as a similar demand and exception for the United States. The terms of the treaty and the existing situation would seem to make the United States practically and legally a corporation sole, for the purpose of constructing, operating, and managing the canal, with exactly the same rights, obligations, and responsibilities which would pertain to any other corporation provided for by the treaty, doing exactly the same thing under the treaty. But as an incident to ownership, the vessels of the owner, used for its own purposes in connection with the project, could undoubtedly be passed. A corporation could pass its vessels used for canal purposes. Equally, the United States as a sovereign passes its public vessels used for its own purposes. That is what this section means. But its qualifying phrases clearly exclude the vessels and commerce of all else than of the owner, the sovereign in the case of the United States. The article clearly grants preferential rights to the vessels belonging to the sovereign, and as clearly puts vessels belonging to the citizens of that sovereign on the same terms as vessels of the citizens of all nations, because all are equally "customers" of the owner of the canal.

ALL NATIONS.

One of the principal arguments that the United States is not included within the terms "of all nations observing these rules," is that because the United States is required to make and promulgate the rules, the treaty should not be construed as holding that the nation which makes the rules, should be included within or bound by the rules to be promulgated by itself. This is clearly fallacious, because article 2 provides that "subject to the provisions of the treaty" the United States shall have the rights incident to such construction, and so forth. That, of course, applies the remaining portion of the treaty to the rights of ownership. The remaining portions of the treaty are articles 3 and 4 containing the rules framed upon the rules governing the Suez Canal. These rules at Suez and the similar ones at Panama embrace all vessels of commerce of all nations. An inspection of the rules themselves, clearly shows that they do apply and were intended to apply to the United States.

It must be admitted that the last sentence of section 1, article 3, applies to the United States, "such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable." If not, then this Nation can make unjust rules which would practically make the canal useless to the other nations. Again, the last sentence of section 2 applies in terms "the United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder." It is difficult to argue that such language does not apply to the United States. Section 5 provides that "the provision of this section shall apply to waterways adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end." This was inserted because both Great Britain and the United States at various times, had insisted that the 3-mile limit might be extended under certain conditions. It was agreed here clearly, that the 3-mile limit shall apply as one of the rules binding the United States in its treatment of the canal, except in time of its own wars. Section 6 binds the United States itself in time of war and peace to maintain the integrity of the canal plant. This is the main purpose of this section. So any reasonable examination of these rules clearly shows that they do apply to and bind the United States and were so intended when framed. One other thought in this connection: The preamble applies the general principle of neutralization to these rules, as set forth in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. This principle is for equality and equity of treatment of all—the essence of these rules. The preamble binds the whole treaty, and so covers the United States. Of course as it has been heretofore stated, that in time of war, the treaty ceases to operate and the United States may adopt any means necessary for its defense and temporarily close the canal.

COASTWISE TRADE.

One of the main contentions of those opposed to the repeal of the provision exempting coastwise trade from tolls is that it is not the concern of any other nation as to what we do about our coastwise trade, because it is wholly confined to our own people; no foreigners can engage in it, so there can be no competition and therefore no inequality or discrimination as to them where they can not enter. It is urged that this view is sustained by the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., p. 332).

PREMISES WRONG.

First of all, the premises for such contentions are entirely unsound. As I have previously shown, our coastwise trade is not solely confined to our own people. Foreigners are invited to and do engage in the very traffic described in and covered by the treaty, to a very large extent. These facts can not be ignored or denied; consequently, where the very basis for such exemption from tolls fails, the exemption itself should cease to exist.

ANALYZES CASE.

But I will briefly analyze the case of Olsen against Smith to ascertain whether its doctrine should be applied to the situation presented by this bill, concerning the exemption of coastwise vessels from Panama Canal tolls. The case is practically this:

CASE OF OLSEN VERSUS SMITH.

Texas had a statute requiring compulsory pilotage for all vessels entering its ports, but excepting domestic steam vessels in coastwise trade, as provided by section 4444, Revised Statutes United States. The court held that as to a British vessel coming from a foreign port, such exception did not constitute a violation of the treaty between Great Britain and the United States, containing the language "no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any port of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States." The reason for such holding was substantially stated in the opinion, that it is allowable under such language to consider different classes of vessels—those from foreign ports would be one class and domestic steam vessels in coastwise trade would be another class; and that such treaty was not violated because vessels of the class in the foreign trade were included within compulsory pilotage, while domestic steam vessels in coastwise trade might be exempt from it. This is obviously true, because, under the statute and the reason for the existence of the two classes under the laws as to the compulsory pilotage, they are entirely different.

In the opinion the Chief Justice stated:

Neither the exemption of coastwise vessels from pilotage resulting from any law of the United States nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade, and in favor of vessels of the United States in such trade. In substance the proposition but asserts that because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations, therefore there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even although such regulations apply without discrimination to all vessels engaged in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign.

DOCTRINE OF CASE.

Thus under the doctrine of this decision, under the general terms of a treaty, Congress may classify vessels as to their treatment under our navigation laws when such classes are natural, reasonable, and necessary for the proper administration of the laws and the promotion of the commerce covered by the treaty. Accordingly, Congress established classes of vessels with different regulations as to the different classes. Coastwise steam vessels were in one class and exempt from pilotage; foreign and American vessels on foreign voyages were in another class and were compelled to pay pilotage.

The commercial nations of the world make similar classifications and rules, and find it necessary under a reasonable and fair construction of all commercial treaties. This is the substance of the doctrine laid down by the Supreme Court in the Olsen-Smith case and is entirely sound. But this very statement shows that such decision does not apply to the exemption of vessels in our coastwise trade from tolls at Panama, under the provisions of the Panama Canal treaty. The provisions of the treaties demonstrate this fact.

The following is the pertinent provision of the old British treaty of 1815 construed in the Olsen v. Smith case:

That no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States.

Following is a copy of section 1, article 3, of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty concerning the treatment of vessels and commerce at the canal:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

At a glance it is evident that the treaty of 1815 relates solely to the equality as to treatment of vessels. The Panama Canal treaty relates to two different subjects: First, equality as to treatment of vessels, the same as the treaty of 1815; second, that there shall be no discrimination as to charges or conditions of traffic, which is not covered at all by the treaty of 1815.

I have already discussed at some length, that foreigners can and do engage in our coastwise traffic and that the second clause of the Panama treaty forbids discrimination as to this very traffic. Consequently the very basis for the classification and rule of the Olsen-Smith case concerning vessels alone, being based upon a class where foreigners can not engage, can not be applied to the coastwise traffic, in which foreigners are invited to and do actually compete. The Canadian controversy clearly compels a construction that the treaty clause as to traffic covers citizens, routes, and commerce, where foreigners can and do engage. Thus must fall the application of the Olsen-Smith case concerning the clause as to traffic.

RULE AS TO VESSELS.

But even as to the first clause, relating solely to vessels and requiring entire equality of treatment as to them, the Olsen-Smith case does not apply. That case excepts by implication from the general terms of a treaty, the rules as to local pilotage, because such were incident to and necessary for the success and promotion of commerce and navigation covered by the treaty. This is undoubtedly sound, and applies as well to tonnage, light, harbor dues, and so forth, for similar purposes. These classes of local exceptions are necessarily implied and need not be expressed, because required plainly for the protection and promotion of the commerce for which the treaty exists, and which are necessary to properly make it effective.

TREATY DIFFERENCES.

But the treaty itself is framed expressly for the purpose of promoting and protecting commerce and navigation themselves, on terms of equality and reciprocity. If commerce and navigation themselves could be impliedly excepted from its operation, then there would be nothing at all left in the treaty, upon which it could be effective. The very purpose of its existence would be destroyed, so such implications can not be and never have been allowed.

The rules and practice always have been, in framing treaties, that when any substantial part of commerce or navigation is desired to be excepted from the general provisions of the treaty, that such exception must be made by express terms for that purpose. This is the reason why more than 30 of the treaties of commerce and navigation of the United States with other nations, contain in express terms an exception of our coastwise trade from the general provisions of the treaty. Such express exception concerns the very substance of the treaty itself, while the implied exceptions as to pilotage, and so forth, are merely incident to the commerce and navigation to be promoted or regulated by it. It is evident, that this difference is fundamental in the making of treaties, and that the Olsen-Smith case can and only does decide and discuss this incident to commerce implied as an exception, and does not at all consider the question of excepting by implication, a substantial part of the treaty itself.

The implied exception of pilotage in the Olsen-Smith case merely concerns a local municipal regulation, involving petty local rules for the purpose of promoting commerce.

The general implied exception of this exemption from tolls of coastwise trade, contained in the Panama Canal act, would cover the commerce of continents and oceans, and affect the very purpose and scope for which the treaty itself was framed. Such exception would destroy the effect of any such agreement. If such a construction be adopted, as those contend who demand free tolls, it would practically mean the abolition of all existing treaties of commerce and navigation, because, when either of the parties desire, they could impliedly except the very substance of the treaty itself and thus destroy the effect of it. When such a contention as this is followed to its necessary and logical conclusion, its fallacy is painfully evident.

A more detailed discussion of this subject can be found in my remarks on the passage of the Panama Canal bill in the House of Representatives on May 17, 1912, as contained in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date, pages 7005 to 7007.

NO YIELDING TO GREAT BRITAIN.

Many enthusiastic and patriotic citizens, and even Members of this House, are apparently terrified at the thought that in the passage of this bill we are pliantly yielding to the demands of Great Britain, and conceding a natural right of our own people in the management of the Panama Canal. Nothing could be further from the truth or fact than these two statements. Everyone knows that Great Britain has certain rights under its treaty with us, or there would be no treaty. Since this treaty and these rights exist, in cases where Great Britain believes her rights have been infringed in any way by our action, it is the duty of that Government to bring such condition to the attention of the Government of the United States. If the case were reversed, it would equally be the duty of the United States to bring it to the attention of Great Britain; and we would hold any administration recreant to its duty if it did not so do.

The British notes were courteous, and plainly stated the points of their contention. If not diplomatically settled, arbitration was respectfully sought for the differences. This is done in numerous cases as to other differences between nations, upon all sorts of questions. No one has complained, or has any right to complain, against this course of action. It is the courteous and just thing to do; and it is surprising that our people at this time are inflamed against such conduct, which is the fruit of many years of advancement in diplomatic relations. It is the only way to preserve and increase a kindly sentiment among the nations, make for peace and good will, and prevent the increase of military and naval armaments. Surely, men can not be broad or fair who contend that courteous and kindly presentation of differences under existing agreements between nations, constitutes an insolent demand sufficient to arouse a swelling indignation, which seems to fill the breasts of some of our overenthusiastic patriots. It is a reflection upon our intelligence that this is the case.

If such views should continue to prevail, then practically all diplomatic intercourse and peaceful settlement of disputes will be at an end, because it would be considered a heinous offense to courteously call attention to the differences among nations as to obligations or the interpretation of any international agreements. This same strange view if carried into private affairs, would almost destroy civilization itself, because preventing any man who may have an agreement with his neighbor calling attention in a friendly way to any differences of opinion between them, concerning its terms and obligations. Our people certainly do not wish any such consequences when the facts are presented. They have always desired a peaceful and just settlement of any dispute, with every nation in the world.

NO SURRENDER OF RIGHTS.

Equally absurd is the other contention that this bill before us to-day constitutes a permanent surrender of our national rights and the privileges of our citizens in the use of the Panama Canal. This act does not pretend to construe the treaty or the rights of any nation or individuals who may use the canal. It only provides that as to such use "all must be treated alike and without discrimination." This shall be the declaration of the policy of management until such time as it may be changed by Congress.

Everybody knows that this Congress can not bind itself against its own future action, and, much less, it can not bind any future Congress. Hereafter, if the occasion should arise, this Congress or any future Congress may enact any rule of management of the canal as it may deem necessary. No one can prevent such action, and this act certainly does not seek to do so. Whenever Congress wishes to change its policy, either of the two nations, Great Britain or Panama, having treaty rights with us as to the use of the Canal, may present any reason they please as to whether such action may adversely affect their rights. Then this Government can consider, as it is doing now, what its proper course shall be. The bill before us can not change the treaty rights of any nation or individual, and no future act of Congress can, unless in the form of an agreement for such purpose. This bill only concerns our action now, and may be based on grounds entirely outside of our treaty obligations. Indeed, many of us strongly believe that this policy of free tolls would be unjust and unsound from every standpoint, economic and international, and have so expressed ourselves as strongly as we could.

It is to be trusted that our people will consider this question on a fair and just basis, and not allow false statements and unjust prejudices to warp their usual sincere and honest desires for justice and righteousness.

UPBUILD COASTWISE TRADE.

One point more and I will close. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] stated yesterday that one reason why this bill should not pass is because the existing law exempting coastwise trade from tolls would help to build up the merchant marine in our coastwise trade. Why, think of what that coastwise trade is now and how it will be helped by the Panama Canal. Foreign vessels can not engage in our coastwise trade. Our laws grant our vessels a monopoly in that business which is tremendously important and profitable. Railroad-owned ships are prohibited from the use of the canal, so that that important means of competition is taken away, and these gentlemen can do as they please without any regulation by any public authority. They can charge as they please and manage as they please without regulation. In addition, the long and short haul clause of the interstate-commerce act, as construed, will prevent the railroads from very largely engaging in the great bulk of transcontinental traffic, so that business to a large and profitable extent will be necessarily forced upon the steamships. Yet more than that, we give them free passage, we give them free pilotage and towage, we give them free insurance against accidents in the use of the canal. All of those things cost other ships and our ships in the foreign trade much money, and they all cost the people much money to furnish. But they would get them all free of charge in the coastwise business under a policy of free tolls. What do the people of the United States get out of all this beneficence?

The condition of the merchant marine has been referred to, and the very able and exhaustive report of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] shows this country clearly what that condition is, that the railroads and two steamship consolidations control 94 per cent of the gross tonnage in the entire Atlantic and Gulf coastwise trade. (P. 403, vol. 4, Report Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, 1914.) These are the ships which will be mainly benefited by the existing law.

WILL SHIPS BE BUILT?

Now, let us ascertain whether new ships will probably be built and our supply of shipping be increased by means of free tolls alone. The hearings before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce clearly showed two things—

First, that shipowners themselves did not need a subsidy and did not especially ask for free tolls, and it would not help commerce to have free tolls. They stated they did not, without any reservation, although they frankly admitted they would be glad to have them. See testimony of Mr. McGregor, president San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, page 997, volume 4, hearings; testimony of Mr. Raymond, manager of steamship lines, page 551, volume 1, hearings; testimony of Mr. George S. Dearborn, president American-Hawaiian Steamship Co., page 567, volume 1, hearings; Mr. D. E. Skinner, president Port Blakely Lumber Co., page 1046, volume 4, hearings. And none of the testimony anywhere has been stronger than that it would be only one of several important factors toward the upbuilding of our merchant marine. These were all of the practical business men who appeared before your committee. They are all actually engaged in large business enterprises and are well acquainted with existing conditions, and nearly all of them appeared before the committee to favor the policy of remission of tolls to our coastwise trade.

Secondly, none of them stated that one single ship would be built in this country in consequence of free tolls, not one, and I make the statement without any reservation whatever and challenge you to show the contrary. Of course many ships will be built on account of the opening of the canal and the vast increase of business resulting from it. But not one ship will be built in consequence of free tolls alone, and this is the reason for it.

Mr. MANAHAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Allow me to finish this, because it is right in the middle of my statement, and I may cover the very question you ask. The best type of ships which will use the canal will be of between 4,000 and 5,000 tons net register and about 10,000 tons cargo capacity.

If you will examine the last report of the Bureau of Navigation and the hearings on the Panama bill had by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, you will find that such is the best and lastest type of ship which will be profitable for use in the canal. The reason is that a larger ship could not be profitably used, because it could not be filled for its regular voyages, that it would thus run partially empty, and so would not be profitable. So that is the best type of ship which is now under construction and is proposed to use in the canal.

SHIP TOLLS.

Now, the tolls on that type of ship of between 4,000 and 5,000 tons would be between $5,000 and $6,000 for the voyage. The distance is about 5,300 miles from New York to San Francisco, so that the tollage would be a little over $1 per mile on that voyage, and that will, of course, be the principal traffic and principal route for coastwise trade. About a dollar a mile for that voyage would be the tollage.

The mail subsidy act of 1891 classified ships for the purposes of construction and mail subsidy. Class 3 provides that ships of 14 knots speed shall have a subsidy of $1 per mile for distance traversed. That act has been in force for nearly 23 years, and only two ships have been built under it, and those right after the Spanish War, for our Cuban trade. If it had been profitable to build ships on a subsidy of a dollar a mile, would not some have been built in these 23 years, while we have had such a statute on our books. [Applause.] What expectation have we that this subsidy of a similar amount will do any better, especially when it is connected with this most important and significant situation? Capital is timid and will not take chances in the vessel business, as we all know. We know and capital knows that this policy of free tolls is, to speak mildly, obnoxious to many of our own people and is objected to strongly by nearly every foreign nation. With such a situation, it is extremely likely either that this repeal bill will pass, or that an arbitration may be had and result unfavorably for free tolls. So such a subsidy would be abolished. Every sensible man knows such to be the situation. So not a dollar can be found to build a ship because of free tolls. If a subsidy of a dollar a mile with an assured continuance of it will not cause the building of any merchant ships for more than 23 years, then surely a dollar a mile under this bill with an extremely uncertain continuance, will not cause any increase of our merchant marine. In fact, I think the contrary will be true. The ill feeling, discrimination, and retaliation which will arise against American interests in consequence of free tolls, will surely prevent the upbuilding of our foreign merchant marine. Instead of helping our shipping, I think free tolls would deal it a deadly blow.

Mr. MANAHAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. MANAHAN. Is it not a fact that contracts for building ships were made, and two ships were built and contracts for six were entered into, but abandoned as soon as this law was enacted?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No.

Mr. MANAHAN. It was so testified before the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; I do not think so. If so, the gentlemen is more familiar with that than I am.

Mr. MANAHAN. One more question, if the gentleman will permit.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. MANAHAN. Is it not also a fact that the representatives of the shipbuilders who testified before your committee that they would not build ships if they had free tolls were the representatives of steamship companies owned by the railroads, and therefore enemies of the canal? [Applause.]

And in the same connection is it not a fact that the Hill railroads in the Northwest are vitally interested in getting this repeal which the gentleman advocates? [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will answer the question with two facts. No shipbuilder as such testified before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, so that the gentleman on the first proposition is absolutely mistaken.

Secondly, I have been on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for more than 10 years, I think, and during all of that time this legislation has been in force, and not one single representative, not one single man, directly or indirectly representative of any railroad or transportation company, except the steamboats, has ever come to any member of the committee that I know of urging in any way the repeal of free tolls. And I want to say that I can not make my statement too strong and too vigorous. [Applause.]

And, further, I want to brand his statement as absolutely false, without any question of contradiction; and if any man has any statement to the contrary, let him put the names and the facts in the RECORD, instead of making insinuations. [Applause.] It is time that that kind of talk were stopped in the discussions in the House of Representatives. [Applause.]

Mr. MANAHAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. If the gentleman has a legitimate question, I will be glad to answer, but he realizes, no doubt, that I am taking more time than I ought.

Mr. MANAHAN. Is it not a legitimate question to ask you if the Hill lines are not vitally interested in the repeal of this law?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I answer no; and I have never heard about it, and I doubt if anybody else has ever heard about it; and it makes not a particle of difference to anyone of them, so far as I know. If the gentleman has any facts, let him make them of record instead of making insinuations from a back seat. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman has made a wonderful speech—the speech of a statesman. I would like to ask him this question.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY. Experts estimate that freight rates will be reduced 25 to 50 per cent on freight that goes through the Panama Canal after completion. I would like to ask the gentleman, if we should charge tolls on the coastwise trade, would it, in his opinion, wipe out the benefit accruing from the reduction of freight rates, and just what effect the charging of tolls would have on the reduction of that freight rate?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That is a very sensible and comprehensive question [laughter and applause], and if the gentleman will allow me I will answer it for just a few moments. The gentleman is right. The very able report made by Dr. Emory R. Johnson, the special commissioner on traffic and tolls of the Isthmian Canal Commission, shows that there will be a reduction of freight rates by water in consequence of the opening of the Panama Canal, as the gentleman stated, of between 20 and 60 per cent. The very able paper of Mr. Dunn, heretofore referred to, and the testimony of witnesses before the Committee on Interstate Commerce shows that water rates from coast to coast may get as low as $3.25 to $3.50 per short ton of 2,000 pounds, including regular tolls, which would be from 10 to 15 per cent of this amount. Remember that the toll of $1.20 per net registered ton is not for 2,000 pounds but for a space of 100 cubic feet, which will contain from 1½ to 2½ cargo tons; so that $1.20 toll per net registered ton would amount to between 2 and 4 cents per hundred on freight, or between 40 and 80 cents per cargo ton of 2,000 pounds.

REPORT AS TO RESULTS.

Now, the report of Dr. Johnson states the following (p. 88, Traffic and Tolls):

4. The effects of the canal upon American trade and upon rail rates will not be much affected by the exemption of coastwise ships from the payment of Panama tolls. If the nonpayment of tolls were to reduce freight rates by the amount of tolls, the freight rates—which will be from $6 to $20 a ton—might possibly be 60 cents a ton lower. That would be of some assistance to the Pacific coast jobbers and large shippers, and would somewhat increase the advantage which the canal will give the East over the Middle West in trading with the west coast.

It is not probable, however, that the exemption of the payment of tolls will appreciably affect the rates charged by the regular steamship lines. The nonpayment or remission of tolls will chiefly aid the owners of the coastwise marine and not the shippers. Most traffic will be handled by the regular lines, which will charge common rates fixed in conference, and competition, while not eliminated, will be so regulated as to enable the carriers to keep charges well above the lowest rates at which traffic can profitably be carried. Whether there be tolls or no tolls, the line steamship rates will not be based on cost of service, but will be such as the traffic will bear and increase. Canal tolls, being a part of the cost of service, will not make line steamship rates higher, nor will the omission of tolls cause the freight rates to be lower. This is not true of the rates payable on bulk cargoes or traffic handled in individual vessels operated under charters. Charter rates are competitive, and the few large shippers who can use a chartered vessel will be benefited by being relieved of the payment of canal tolls. As is explained in Chapter XIII, it is probable that the payment of tolls by ships engaged in our coast-to-coast trade would affect neither the rates of the regular steamship lines nor the charges of the transcontinental railroads.

In his statement Mr. Dunn also shows that freight rates through the canal on bulky, heavy merchandise will probably be reduced to about $2.90 per ton dead weight, excluding the tolls, or about $3.40 to $3.50 per ton, including the tolls. The testimony before the Committee on Interstate Commerce substantiates such figures. He estimates that the Panama Canal will have comparatively little effect upon the Atlantic coast railroads. He estimates that they will lose their coast-to-coast traffic, but this is insignificent. But he states—with possible $2 per ton sea freight with tolls added between New York and San Francisco the overland competition of railroads is simply annihilated. There will be no transcontinental railroads within the meaning of the term as we have been accustomed to it.

The result will be that such low rates to the larger shipper, who can charter his own vessel or secure preferential rates with the regular lines by special agreement, will make discrimination against the small man in favor of the large shipper.

PROBABLE RESULT.

The situation can thus be forecast to this extent: The traffic eastward and westward annually between the coasts at first will be about 3,500,000 tons each way, and it will increase rapidly in the future. There will always be a large amount of high-grade freight which must be carried by rail, irrespective of rates. Upon this free tolls will have no bearing at all. On the other side there will be a large amount of heavy, bulky freight requiring cheap rates, which will be carried from coast to coast by water, on regular liners or on chartered ships. As to this the large shipper will get a reduction in his freightage by the reason of free tolls, while the small shipper will probably not get much if anything. There will then remain a considerable amount of competitive freight both as to character and place of origin. This will vary from time to time as circumstances change. But the amount of it necessarily will be insignificant, in comparison with the vast amount of other freight which must be carried by the railroads. Probably only a fraction of 1 per cent for the railroad, would be this competitive transcontinental freight. This being so, the railroads can not afford to compete to any extent with the water lines, if to do so they are obliged to lower their vast mass of local and intermediate rates.

REVENUES OF RAILROADS.

At the present time, the revenues of the railroads can not be appreciably reduced without bringing disaster upon the country. It is estimated that between $5,000,000,000 to $10,000,000,000 will be needed by the railroads in the United States within the near future to make the extensions and to provide for facilities required by our people in the transaction of their vast daily business. This amount, or any considerable part of it, can not be secured if the credit of these railroads be impaired. These extensions and facilities which our people need can not be provided, unless reasonable revenues be afforded and assured to the carriers. Reasonable and fair wages to the railroad employees to secure the high grade of service needed upon our railroads, can not be secured unless there are ample revenues from which to pay them. Under these circumstances, it can not be expected that local or intermediate rates will be reduced at all by reason of free tolls in the use of the Panama Canal, because such reduction would be impossible in view of the necessity of maintaining credit and of the continued expenditures and requirements of the service.

CENTRAL STATES.

The Central States will not consent that their local and intermediate rates shall be increased or maintained for the sake of cheap transcontinental rates, competing with water lines, passing through their own territory. Such would not be fair or tolerated by the States in the interior. Under these circumstances, transcontinental rates by rail on competitive products can not be reduced except in a few instances, which will be comparatively insignificant in comparison with the vast volume of traffic. So free tolls will have but little or no effect upon the great mass of railroad rates of the country. I think this is fully understood and expected except by the few who are striving to stir the unthinking, by arousing the old prejudice against the railroads.

Sometimes this is easy, requiring only assertions without regard to facts. But here, where the situation is obvious, and so much has been made public as to what may be expected—and any sensible man may calculate for himself as to the effect of the new traffic through the canal—there would not seem to be occasion to further misunderstand or attempt to deceive the unwary.

DISCRIMINATION.

There is one phase of this discussion which should not be overlooked, and that is that the policy of free tolls to coastwise trade in the use of the Panama Canal, simply means the subsidizing of the business interests of the two coasts, especially of the Pacific coast, in their competition for the trade of the interior, with their competitors of the Mississipp' Valley and the central part of the country. As it is now, there is a large competitive region within which the coast cities from Seattle on the north to Los Angeles on the south compete with their trade rivals in the Mississippi Valley, beginning with the Twin Cities, St. Paul and Minneapolis, on the north to New Orleans on the south, and extending as far east as Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Cincinnati, and Detroit. Naturally, when the canal shall be opened and the rates by water greatly reduced, the business interests of the Pacific coast will have an advantage by extending their territory largely eastward, and to that extent diminish the trade territory of their rivals of the central west. This vast increase of business for the coast cities, with a reduction of the business in that region of the central cities is to be expected, and, I think, all are prepared for it. In this connection, I again quote from the able paper of Mr. Dunn, of San Francisco:

PANAMA CANAL WILL EFFECT DIVERSION OF PACIFIC COAST TRADE.

With substantially the same Panama Canal freight rates between San Francisco and European ports as between San Francisco and New York, it can be foreseen that all Pacific coast imports from Europe will come direct to San Francisco through the canal, this being a diversion of the same foreign trade of the Pacific coast now conducted through the port of New York. Also it can be foreseen that a large, if not the larger, part of the present Pacific coast imports from the Mississippi Valley and North Atlantic States will be brought instead from Europe, this being a diversion of trade from our American States to foreign countries.

It can be foreseen, too, that exports of the Pacific coast will, through the canal, enter the Atlantic and Gulf coasts' ports and markets, excluding more or less of the present imports into them from the Mississippi Valley and North Central Atlantic States, this being a diversion of trade from these interior States to the Pacific Coast States. Also, that exports of the Pacific coast will enter the European markets, excluding more or less of their home productions and of their imports from our Atlantic States and the countries of eastern Europe and of Asia, this being a diversion, and in the aggregate a very large diversion, of trade from these States and countries to the Pacific Coast States and Provinces.

The Panama Canal would now seem certain to materially lessen the freight traffic of the railroads between the Allegheny and Rocky Mountain Ranges. These railroads are certain to lose all their present westbound coast-to-coast freight and two-thirds of their present eastbound coast-to-coast freight. They are also certain to lose most of the westbound Pacific coast freight originating in their territory. The greater part of this last-described freight will become diverted to new points of origin in the Atlantic States and Europe, and the remainder will, as near as practicable, take the all-waterway route to the Pacific coast by the Mississippi River to New Orleans and thence by the canal.

The Panama Canal will have the effect of enormously increasing the traffic over railroads west of the Rocky Mountains—the Pacific coast railroads. These lines losing their proportion of the present westbound overland freight to the canal, would nevertheless take most of it back again as east or inland-bound local traffic from Pacific coast ports, making probably a larger net earning from it as all-local traffic than they are now making from it as part of the coast-to-coast traffic. They will lose about 2,000,000 tons of their present annual eastbound freight movement, recovering some of it as local traffic from inland points of origin to coast seaports.

All of their net loss by diversion of their traffic will, however, be very much more than counterbalanced by the increased Pacific coast exports, over 5,000,000 tons of which have to be moved by railroads from inland points of origin to coast ports; by the increased tonnage of Pacific coast imports through the canal, over half of which will have to be carried by rail inland from the seaports; and by the increased local freight carrying of Pacific coast products from producers to consumers. It is doubtful, indeed, if the present railroads in Pacific coast territory are able now to carry the greater tonnage which will be the effect of the Panama Canal. It would seem as if many more new lines must be built and many existing lines double-tracked.

With a possible $2 a ton sea freight rate between San Francisco and New York, overland competition of railroads is simply annihilated. There will be no transcontinental railroads within the meaning of the term as we have become accustomed to it. There can be no political questions over transcontinental freight rates, because freight will simply cease going over the railroads that way. The Central Pacific Railroad, least of all the present so-called transcontinental railroads, will be one of them. It will, instead, become a great tributary railroad system to the port of San Francisco, distributing imports and collecting exports for it in western Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, and New Mexico, as well as in the seven Pacific Coast States. In this respect it will occupy much the same traffic situation to San Francisco, in a vastly greater territory, that the New York Central Railroad system occupies to New York.

SUMMARY OF PANAMA CANAL EFFECT ON SEA TRAFFIC.

Petroleum-burning Diesel motor ships will become the ship-freight carriers on both oceans through California petroleum becoming available for such use on the Atlantic Ocean.

The basic freight rate for staples through the canal between the Pacific coast and either New York, Liverpool, or other European ports will be about $2 per ton dead weight, exclusive of canal toll.

Pacific coast foreign trade with Europe will become diverted from the overland New York route to the all-sea route through the canal.

The present Pacific coast trade overland with the Mississippi Valley and North Central Atlantic States will become largely diverted into direct trade by the all-sea route through the canal with the Atlantic States and European countries—more largely the latter than the former.

The trade of the Pacific coast will become enormously expanded through the cheapness and availability of the all-sea route through the canal as an outlet for products hitherto unmarketable on the Pacific coast.

The Atlantic coast railroads will be very little affected; the railroads between the Allegheny and Rocky Mountains will lose practically all of their Pacific coast traffic; and the railroads of the Pacific coast will gain enormously in traffic from the handling to and from the seaports of the new exports and imports. Transcontinental railroads as such will cease to be. Transcontinental freight rates can not be made competitively with an open all-sea freight rate of $2 per ton.

The Pacific coast will gain rapidly and enormously in population by immigration from European countries through the canal and by immigration from our Mississippi Valley States by rail overland, and this new population will increase the all-sea-route trade between the Pacific coast and Europe.

INJURE THE INTERIOR.

Thus, free tolls in the coastwise trade, only means a further increase in the advantage of the business interests on the coasts, and to the same extent diminishes the competing business interests of the interior. It will enable the large shippers of the coasts, who can receive the advantage of free tolls, to extend to that extent their trade territory as against their competitors of the Central West. It would practically mean that free tolls would be a subsidy to the merchants on the Pacific coast to crowd out their competitors in the disputed territory. This is grossly unfair and unjust. The generous and fair-minded business man of this country does not seek such unjust advantage. I am unwilling to believe, that when the broad, fair, and able business men on the Pacific coast realize the injustice of this situation, that they will insist upon this unjust subsidy to them, when already the whole Nation has been taxed to pour manifold bounties upon them, in the construction and operation of this great canal.

Mr. Speaker, I fear I have taken up too much of the time of the House, but I have endeavored to discuss the question from the high plane of public duty, and in this discussion I have endeavored not to engage in any personal dispute or altercation with anybody.

This matter should be above that sort of discussion. In a question like this, which involves the welfare of our people and the honor of our Nation, I am willing that my politics shall cease at the water's edge. I am glad in the enactment of this measure to follow a Democratic President, when I believe it will redound to the good of those whom I am sworn to serve, and to the honor and glory of our common country. [Applause.]

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield to myself 20 minutes. [Applause.]

I have listened with great interest to my colleague on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, from the State of Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS]. I have a very high personal regard for him, and there is no more valuable Member of this body. Upon this very vital and important question, however, we have agreed to disagree.

In opening his address, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] declared that the free-tolls exemption was not a plank in the platform of the Republican Party. That is true; but it was the policy of a Republican President, for whom I have the greatest respect. [Applause.] It was the policy of a Republican Senate. It was unnecessary for the Republican Party to have in its platform any declaration to compel that great party, in a crisis such as this, to uphold the American position. An overwhelming majority of Republicans in this House are sustaining the historic policy of the party in favor of an American-controlled canal. [Applause.]

The gentleman has quoted Senator Davis as being opposed to the exemption; and I want to bring to the attention of the House the remarks made by Senator LODGE, who voted against exemption, and who, I believe, is going to vote against exemption again in the Senate. Senator LODGE stated on the floor of the Senate on July 20, 1912:

> I voted against the Bard amendment. I voted against it in the belief that it was unnecessary; that the right to fix tolls, if we built the canal or it was built under our auspices, was undoubted. I know that was the view taken by the then Senator from Minnesota, Mr. Davis, who was at that time chairman of the committee. I certainly so stated on the floor. * * *

Now, let us quote from Senator Davis himself.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Owing to the shortness of my time I can not yield, unless the gentleman desires to state that his father-in-law did not make that statement.

Mr. GARDNER. I propose to read part of a debate in which my father-in-law participated, if the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. The gentleman will read it in his own time. The statement is from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. GARDNER. I shall read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 17, 1912, three days earlier than the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Then mine was the last.

Mr. GARDNER. His memory had been refreshed.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Yes; his memory is generally refreshed toward the English view. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER. Three days before the time of which you speak he said he did not remember the question having been raised.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Well, he remembered it afterwards. His memory may have changed recently.

Mr. GARDNER. You have quoted his statement made 12 years after the vote of which he was speaking.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. It was some years since our friend STEVENS talked to him, also. [Applause and laughter.]

Let us read from Senator Davis's report, which has been quoted on the floor with such apparent force:

> This sweeping modification of article 1 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, as to all its restrictions upon the right of the United States, under its auspices, to construct the canal and to have and enjoy all the rights—such as ownership—incident to its construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for its management and regulation, leaves no ground, substantial or conjectural, on which Great Britain could hereafter contend for any of the restrictions contained in that article as remaining in force against the United States.

[Applause.]

The gentleman has quoted the Canadian treaty, known as the Washington treaty of 1871, relative to the use of canals and channels of the Great Lakes. We are now asked by Great Britain to surrender by repealing the free-toll provision of the canal act "because we are violating a treaty." When we asked Great Britain to surrender in that controversy, the English Government refused, and only did so finally because we had retaliated against her, but in the official correspondence declared that she still adhered to her interpretation of the treaty. She was not generous enough at that time to give way to our contention, although we had a stronger case by far. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] becomes greatly alarmed because he fears that the Canadians will retaliate against us; but as an American citizen and a Member of Congress I will not consent to surrender an important American right because of the threats of action by any foreign nation. [Applause.] This question must be settled upon its merits, and not because of fear. There has been too much of that kind of talk in this controversy. [Applause.]

The gentleman admitted upon the floor of this House that one of the British contentions was wrong, namely, Sir Edward Grey's contention that we can not pass the ships of the Republic of Panama without the payment of tolls, as provided by our treaty with Panama; and when he admits that Great Britain is wrong in this case, he is doubting all her contentions. Great Britain states specifically in her protest that we can not pass a vessel of the United States through this canal without payment of a toll. He may argue as he will that Great Britain is wrong, but the fact nevertheless remains that Great Britain in her note specifically states that the provision which allows us to pass our battleships and other Government vessels free is in direct contravention of the treaty we made with her. We can not get away from that proposition.

There were shipowners who testified before our committee. For instance, the president of the Hawaiian Steamship Co. testified, and in his testimony he said he and other shipowners were indifferent as to whether we imposed tolls upon American coastwise ships. And why? Because the consumer, he declared, not the steamship company, would pay the tolls. [Applause.]

The gentleman also declared that the rate of toll is so insignificant as to make no difference. He says it is only 50 or 60 cents per ton. Anyone who has had any experience in transportation matters knows that a few cents makes a vast difference in reaching a market, a difference of great importance to the people of the interior of this country, who hope to benefit through the opening of the canal by a reduction in freight rates.

Mr. Speaker, owing to the limit fixed under the special rule for debate, it is my purpose to consume but little time. Having expressed my views at some length in the minority report recently submitted, I feel that it is only fair to other Members of the House that they be given an opportunity to be heard. I do desire, however, to very briefly discuss at this time certain phases of the pending question.

The Government of the United States, speaking through Congress, a President, and State Department, takes a positive position touching the interpretation of a disputed treaty, and a succeeding administration demands and insists that this Government reverse itself, abandon its former position, and accept the foreign interpretation of the treaty, an action with no parallel in American history.

Disguise the situation or becloud the issue as you may, there is no escaping from the naked truth that for the first time the people of this great Nation are urged to surrender under foreign pressure.

What is the excuse for this unprecedented action? Diligently seeking information, I have brought to light certain facts which I shall now disclose, permitting the American people to draw their own conclusions and make their own deductions. The circumstances I shall relate are highly significant in their bearing upon the question at issue.

PRIVATE SECRETARY TO SIR EDWARD GREY PAYS THREE VISITS TO WHITE HOUSE.

On November 7, 1913, Sir Edward Tyrrell, secretary to Sir Edward Grey, visited the President and had a private interview. On November 23 he was again received at the White House and granted another interview. November 23 was a Sunday. It is not the practice of the President to discuss official affairs on Sunday with anyone except members of his Cabinet, and with them only on important occasions.

A third visit was made to the President on the morning of Thanksgiving Day, November 27. This visit was also rather unusual. That the matters discussed must have been of the utmost importance is evidenced by the fact that on two of these occasions Sir Edward Grey's private secretary was received upon days not usually given to the transaction of official business—Sunday and Thanksgiving Day. On November 28, the day following the visit of Sir Edward Tyrrell, Hon. Robert L. Borden, the Canadian premier, held a conference with the President and the Secretary of State. Borden, it will be remembered, was the man who visited London in June, 1912, and, according to the Canadian papers as well as the London Times and other British publications, made the original protest against the canal act on behalf of the Canadian railroads. A few days after Borden visited London the first British protest was received in the United States. Following this up, the Canadian premier confers with the President of the United States. Things apparently were coming the British way, and they were pressing their opportunities to the fullest extent.

Sir Edward Tyrrell is said to be the first and last word in authority in the British foreign office. I am ignorant of what was discussed. The papers said the Mexican situation—a question clearly related, so we are informed, with Panama tolls.

HON. SHIRLEY BENN, OF BRITISH PEACE SOCIETY, ANNOUNCES PRESIDENT'S POSITION.

Hon. Shirley Benn, of England, member of Parliament, honorary secretary of the British Peace Committee, and personal friend of Andrew Carnegie, paid two visits to the United States. The first in May, 1913, and the second in October, 1913. On his last visit to America he accompanied Andrew Carnegie, arriving in New York on October 17 on the Mauretania. Hon. Shirley Benn, after his return to London, declared at the Mansion House peace centenary meeting—and I have in my possession positive proof of his statements—that he had seen the President, and there was not the slighest doubt that the peace appropriation and tolls repeal would be put through both the Senate and House, "as the President had pledged himself to carry out these proposals to the satisfaction of the British Government."

So delighted was this member of the British Parliament over the situation as he found it in the United States that shortly after his return he dined Ambassador Page in the House of Commons. This was rather unusual for an ambassador, but then our American ambassador has been saying and doing unusual things of late. Apparently banquets are his long suit.

Keep in mind that this was before the President had taken the American people into his confidence. It is unfortunately significant that the day of the visit of Sir Lionel Carden to the White House announcement should be made of the President's intention to send to Congress a message urging repeal, although tolls were not discussed, we are told. That mystery surrounds all these negotiations and private interviews is the fault of no one but the Chief Executive, because of his lack of frankness. Has there been a trade? Is the Panama Canal the price for the elimination of Huerta?

That the situation may be made more clear, certain facts should be recalled.

BRITISH PROTEST RECEIVED BEFORE CANAL LAW WAS ENACTED.

Great Britain, prior to the final enactment of the canal legislation by the American Congress in 1912, sent word that the action we contemplated taking did not meet with the approval of His Majesty's Government. The views of Great Britain were communicated to Congress before the Senate took final action, but that body, after giving the protest that respectful consideration to which it was entitled, decided by an overwhelming vote that this Government was acting clearly within its rights.

The canal bill then went to conference, again came before this House, was agreed to, and after approval by the President of the United States became a law.

A second protest was made by Great Britain, and our then Secretary of State, speaking for the American people, upheld the position of the Congress of the United States, a Congress Democratic in one branch and Republican in the other.

A MAJORITY OF DEMOCRATS IN CONGRESS SUPPORTED FREE TOLLS.

The RECORD shows that a majority of Democrats in Congress favored free tolls when the canal bill was passed. In the Senate of the United States not a single Democrat voted against the free-toll provision, and a roll call was had on the free-toll amendment. In the House there was a slight Democratic majority against free tolls, but in the Senate and House together the amendment for the exemption of coastwise ships received a Democratic majority of six votes. The RECORD is somewhat in conflict with the statement recently issued from the White House.

In the interim a new administration is inducted into office, elected on a platform one of the planks of which favored the legislation in question, and the presidential candidate, prior to election, gave out to the farmers of the country in a public speech the advantages of the controverted law, and so well chosen were his words, and so valuable as a campaign document were they regarded, that an excerpt from this speech containing the particular reference to the toll exemption was placed in the Democratic campaign textbook.

PRESIDENT'S WASHINGTON PARK ADDRESS, DELIVERED AFTER RECEIPT OF SIR EDWARD GREY'S NOTE.

I entertain a high regard for the President of the United States. His patriotism and honesty of purpose I would not attempt to question. However, like all members of the human family, he is apt to err. In this instance an apparent error in judgment in handling the Mexican situation has necessitated the latest move, at least his message so hints. The most charitable thing to say is that he has been imposed upon.

The date of the President's Washington Park speech, which I inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 28, is significant. It was delivered on August 15, 1912. This was over a month after the first British protest was received, proving that the presidential candidate was not ignorant of Great Britain's attitude when he stood squarely on the Democratic platform.

Should a high sense of honor not have prompted him to have declared then that in his opinion the law he spoke of in such laudatory terms was in "plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain"; would it not have given the American people greater confidence in his sincerity had he taken this position prior to election and the frequent visits of English diplomats and announced then that he must repudiate the free-toll plank, since Great Britain had lodged a protest against the law? [Applause.] Instead of pursuing this course he announced to the farmers of Washington Park on that memorable occasion, "Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means business. It means what it says." Throughout the Pacific coast and, I presume, elsewhere the free-toll plank was frequently quoted by Democratic candidates.

ARBITRATION NOT ATTEMPTED.

Why, then, this unusual and unprecedented action on the part of our Government? With the many questions involved, why are diplomatic negotiations dropped? Why is arbitration, as suggested by Sir Edward Grey in his note of November 14, 1912, not considered? In that note he declared that His Majesty's Government—

Recognized that many persons of note in the United States, whose opinions are entitled to great weight, hold that the provisions of the act do not infringe the conventional obligations by which the United States is bound, and under these circumstances they (His Majesty's Government) desire to state their perfect readiness to submit the question to arbitration.

A year ago I was informed, upon the most reliable authority, that at the time of the famous ROOT speech in the Senate there was every prospect of an amicable adjustment of the whole difficulty—an adjustment without the sacrifice of every American right. The Senate speech was made without consultation with the President or State Department and resulted in the dropping of negotiations.

MESSAGE LIKE ORACLE OF DELPHI.

In joint session we listened most attentively and respectfully to the reading by the President of his special message.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield——

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. No, Mr. Speaker; I have not the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Like the oracle of Delphi, the language of this remarkable message has been interpreted a hundred ways to suit the necessities of the occasion in converting doubting Members.

In the diplomatic gallery on that historic day sat the Secretary of State. Perhaps he understood. At least he approved for, bowing and smiling, he applauded his chief as he urged an abandonment of the American position in favor of the English contention. Has there ever been such a spectacle in American history?

As I watched him sitting in yonder gallery unable to suppress his gratification there came to my mind a speech he delivered, not at Washington Park, but before the House of Representatives of Pennsylvania on May 13, 1913. An account of that speech I hold in my hand. Accompanying the article is a newspaper halftone.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has consumed 20 minutes.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. I yield to myself five minutes more. With this newspaper article there is a picture of our Secretary of State. Beside him stands our honored colleague Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER, who yesterday declared to the House, anticipating no doubt the quotation from this speech, that what the Secretary of State really meant was that he stood for every plank in a platform unless it had some relation to foreign affairs. [Applause.]

If that be so, are those of us who represent the Pacific Coast States to understand that Secretary Bryan repudiates the platform he ran upon on two occasions declaring for Japanese exclusion? Probably the only plank in the platform which he insists upon is that plank which provides "that we favor a single presidential term." [Laughter.]

Now, let us quote Secretary Bryan on the sacredness of a platform declaration. He said:

SECRETARY BRYAN ON SACREDNESS OF PLATFORM PLEDGES.

The fact that we not only have platforms, but that the platform is becoming more specified year after year, is conclusive proof that the people believe in the Democratic theory, and they write their platforms because they believe, and those who run upon them lead the voters to believe, that they believe a platform is binding upon those who stand upon it.

[Laughter and applause.]

In this statement he agrees with his chief that a platform is not molasses to catch flies. [Laughter.] Continuing he declared:

As a believer in the Democratic theory of representative government I desire to announce it as a settled principle not to be questioned in this country that a platform is binding upon every honest man who runs upon that platform. I have heard it said by men after an election that they could not conscientiously support something in their platform, and it raises a very important question whether a man should violate his conscience as a public servant, and I frankly tell you that I believe that no man should violate his conscience, either as an individual or as a public servant. Far be it from me to say that any man elected to any office should as an official do a thing that his conscience condemns. But does that mean that he should violate his platform? No; it seems that his conscience should commence to work before the election and not hibernate until after the election.

[Laughter.]

"CONSCIENCE SHOULD COMMENCE TO WORK BEFORE ELECTION."

This statement of the Secretary of State now seems almost prophetic in view of the Washington Park address. Let me repeat it in order that we may fully appreciate its present significance:

But does this mean—

that he should violate his platform? No; it seems that his conscience should commence to work before the election, and not hibernate until after the election.

[Laughter.]

And finally, to make his meaning so clear that no one might mistake his attitude toward platform breaking, he declared, with a burst of that impassioned oratory for which he is famed:

I lay it down as a proposition, and I am prepared to defend it anywhere, that the representative who secures office upon a platform and then holds the office and betrays the people who elected him is a criminal worse than the man who embezzled money intrusted to him.

[Renewed laughter.]

Does this account for the discreet silence on the part of Secretary Bryan—a silence unusual and unprecedented? Has he in mind the part he took in the framing of the Baltimore platform and of this particular plank?

GREAT BRITAIN'S BRILLIANT DIPLOMACY.

I question if in the history of the world there is afforded another example of as brilliant diplomacy as that displayed by the secretary of state for foreign affairs of Great Britain. On the floor of the American Congress I salute Sir Edward Grey and acknowledge him to be the keenest diplomat of the age. Foreign nations are enjoying the situation.

When one seriously considers the tremendous importance of the issue as now presented and its bearing upon the future history of this Nation, vitally affecting, as it does, the welfare of generations yet unborn, the economic phases of the question become insignificant.

The American people are going to hold us to a strict accounting for the action we take. I am in a sense a partisan. It is but natural, perhaps, that one party should seek to take advantage of the mistakes of the party to which it is opposed, but I would a thousand times rather that no partisan advantage be gained in the present controversy than that a single American right be sacrificed.

The far-reaching consequences of our votes upon this question will endure after we are all dead and gone. My long service in this House has convinced me that neither side of the dividing aisle has a monopoly upon patriotism. We all loyally support the same flag. We are all striving to render faithful service to our country.

If, with your controlling majority and the exercise of Executive pressure, you obtain the votes to repeal this provision, I appeal to you as American citizens to accompany that action with a legislative declaration, unequivocal and unmistakable as to its meaning, that in following the commands of the President you do not accept the foreign power's interpretation of the treaty which would clearly mean the sacrifice of important and vital American rights affecting this Nation commercially, politically, and strategically, now and for all future time.

Unless we specifically reserve the rights for which we have successfully contended for a generation in our efforts to construct an isthmian canal under American control and management we will be paying too dear a price for the elimination of Huerta. [Loud applause.]

APPENDIX.

Mr. Speaker, I shall insert as a part of my remarks the minority report which I submitted from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on the pending bill:

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. KNOWLAND, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, submitted the following minority report, to accompany H. R. 14385:

I emphatically dissent from the views of the majority which are in the main but a reiteration of the arguments advanced by Sir Edward Grey, secretary of state for foreign affairs of Great Britain, in opposition to the position taken by Congress when it enacted the existing canal law, which American position was strongly upheld by Secretary of State Knox on behalf of this Government.

I vigorously protest against the attempt to force the Congress of the United States, through a legislative enactment, to give a British interpretation to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, thus surrendering for all future time rights vitally affecting this Nation commercially, strategically, and politically.

A situation unparalleled and unprecedented in history now confronts this country. The custodian of our rights, our agent in dealing with foreign affairs, advocates the case of Great Britain. We are left without a spokesman. With no attempt to settle through diplomatic channels, with no suggestion looking to the reference of the vital question to arbitration, unconditional and complete surrender is urged because "I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and consequence if you do not grant it to me."

The passage of H. R. 14385, a bill to repeal certain parts of the Panama Canal act, would be a notice to the world that as a result of foreign pressure brought at a time thought to be most opportune, and on the very eve of the consummation of the greatest achievement of the century, the United States was compelled to abandon its traditional policy of an American-controlled canal vigorously affirmed and ably defended by former Presidents, and to virtually surrender its constitutional power to regulate domestic commerce.

RIGHT TO PASS BATTLESHIPS FORECLOSED.

The majority of the committee would, by the provisions of the bill reported, forever foreclose the right of this Government to pass through this American canal without the payment of toll battleships, revenue cutters, colliers, transports, lightships, and other Government craft. This particular paragraph in section 5 of the present law now reads as follows:

"When based upon net registered tonnage for ships of commerce the tolls shall not exceed $1.25 per net registered ton, nor be less, other than for vessels of the United States and its citizens, than the estimated proportionate cost of the actual maintenance and operation."

It can be readily seen that the striking out of the words "other than for vessels of the United States and its citizens," which is the amendment proposed, prevents the charging of any less toll for vessels of the United States as well as for vessels of its citizens, the majority complying with the demands of Great Britain as set forth in the note of Sir Edward Grey.

REASONS ADVANCED FOR SURRENDER.

Advanced as one of the weighty reasons for this inexplicable and hasty attempt to repeal vital provisions of the canal act the majority declare:

"We are advised that the opposite party to the principal treaty under which the canal was constructed fails to approve our action in providing for exemption or to concur in our construction of the treaty."

The "opposite party," whose name the majority appears to be so sensitive about mentioning, notified this Government prior to the final enactment of the canal legislation that it did not approve our reported policy. Congress, believing that it was proceeding clearly within its right and in contravention of no treaty obligation, failed to regard the attitude of the "opposite party" as a compelling reason for abandoning its position.

HISTORY OF LEGISLATION.

It may be well to recall that the original canal bill, provisions of which the majority now seek to repeal, was reported to the House from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on March 16, 1912. Copies of both the majority and minority reports were placed in the hands of every Member of the House, accompanied by a letter calling attention to the toll section. Two months elapsed before the toll provision was voted upon. The bill was considered in the House six days, a longer period than usually allotted measures other than great appropriation bills. The chief debate was upon the toll provision, our treaty obligations being given full and careful consideration. The bill went to the Senate May 24 and was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals. It was there fully discussed and reported from that committee on June 12, passing the Senate on August 9. In the meantime this Government had been officially notified of Great Britain's protest. The exemption clause received a majority of 19 votes in the House. Among those recorded in favor of exemption in the House are Hon. William B. Wilson, of Pennsylvania, and Hon. William C. Redfield, both now members of the present Cabinet, Hon. John W. Davis, of West Virginia, selected by President Wilson as Solicitor General of the United States, and Hon. Francis Burton Harrison, since appointed Governor General of the Philippine Islands. In the United States Senate the free-toll provision carried by a majority of 33 votes, and the bill was finally approved by a President whose patriotism, high-mindedness, and regard for sacred treaty obligations no American can question.

ATTITUDE OF FOREIGN NATIONS.

The majority informs us that "other maritime nations hold the same dissenting opinion." While it is recognized that this statement first emanated from a high official source, many Americans would nevertheless welcome definite confirmation of the receipt of any protest from other maritime nations, although it is not at all improbable that our foreign commercial rivals may sympathize with Great Britain. Attention might likewise be directed to the fact that the opinion of foreign nations is adverse to the attitude which the United States has taken upon other purely American questions, notably the Monroe doctrine, and if we would accept the argument of the majority we would necessarily be compelled to cease to adhere to that well-established American doctrine.

A NEW AND ASTOUNDING DOCTRINE.

Continuing, the majority reechoes the astounding and pusillanimous doctrine recently promulgated which admonishes that when a situation arises whereby a foreign nation interprets a treaty against this country that it is not necessary or wise "to urge our contention, even though fully convinced of our abstract right," and, carrying this reasoning still further, argue that even if it were a close question with the balance tending in our favor, "we could not afford, in a matter of national honor, to contend or even debate."

Thousands of patriotic American citizens insist that we can not maintain our national honor in the present controversy if we abjectly surrender every American right at Panama. The history of this country would have been less glorious had we "failed to urge our contentions even when fully convinced of our right." When the Venezuela question stirred the Nation it was a mistake, according to this new "peace-at-any-price" policy, for President Grover Cleveland to have declared, in a message that commanded the respect of the world:

"To-day the United States is practically sovereign upon this continent and its fiat is law upon the subjects to which it confines its interposition."

VIOLATION OF OUR TREATY WITH PANAMA DEMANDED.

Let us further examine this new doctrine in an effort to ascertain where it will place this Government if made applicable to certain phases of the present controversy. As an illustration, the British protest of November 14, 1912, directs attention to article 19 of our convention of 1903 with the Republic of Panama, declaring that the provision is clearly in conflict with the treaty. The article in question reads as follows:

"The Government of the Republic of Panama shall have the right to transport over the canal its vessels and its troops and munitions of war in such vessels at all times without paying charges of any kind."

Without dwelling upon the fact that England made no protest when this treaty with Panama was pending, the discovery being made after a lapse of 10 years in an effort to bolster up a weak case against the United States, we might ask the majority whether, under this new policy of surrendering American rights whenever disputed by a foreign power, it would have us violate our treaty with Panama by acquiescing in the demands of Great Britain because of her power, or, in this instance, side with the small and defenseless Republic?

Carrying the policy of surrender still further, we are compelled to acknowledge, as already pointed out, that we have no right to pass through this American canal our own battleships and other Government craft, because His Majesty's Government, in unequivocal language, challenges that right. Great Britain realizes that its position in maintaining that the United States is included in the phrase "all nations" becomes untenable if it acknowledges that ships of war and other Government craft can be accorded different treatment than ships of commerce, having in mind this vital paragraph of article 3 of the treaty:

"The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable."

The majority makes a labored and ingenious argument, which the British Government was too wise to attempt for fear of falling into the same trap, in an effort to show that the treaty excepts ships of war. They quote in substantiation of this view article 2 of the treaty, providing that the United States "shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to construction." The majority is here treading on dangerous ground. If this language allows us to pass free of tolls our vessels of war, it is impossible to exclude vessels of commerce under the interpretation the majority would give the treaty.

Again, in an attempt to break the force of the contention of Great Britain that American war ships must pay a toll, the majority declares that "it would be folly for the Government to take money out of the Treasury and pay it back into the Treasury for its war vessels," it is again approaching the "twilight zone" of distinction between war vessels and vessels of commerce. This line of argument could likewise be made applicable to American ships of commerce. Had the majority been more familiar with the British contentions, it would have known that Great Britain objected to any rebate plan upon the ground that it might "impose upon British shipping an unfair share of the burden of the upkeep of the canal, or otherwise prejudice rights secured to British shipping by that treaty," being compelled to maintain this position or abandon its whole contention.

RAILROAD PROVISION MUST BE REPEALED.

We must likewise repeal section 11 of the Panama Canal act if we consistently support and uphold this new doctrine, truckling further to the British Government. Section 11 of the canal act, it will be recalled, provides:

"That no common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce shall operate * * * any common carrier by water through the Panama Canal or elsewhere with which said railroad or other carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic."

In the British note of protest this language is used:

"If the provisions [referring to the provisions of section 11] are intended to apply under any circumstances to British ships, they, His Majesty's Government, must reserve their right to examine the matter further and to raise such contentions as may seem justified."

In other words, Great Britain would participate in all the advantages of the canal, but Sir Edward Grey's cry for equality grows faint when British vessels are to be subjected to any of the restrictions. Was there ever a more flagrant case of inconsistency?

PROOF THAT BRITISH PROTEST WAS INSPIRED BY CANADIAN RAILROADS.

The Canadian Pacific and Canadian Northern report to the Interstate Commerce Commission. When the canal law was passed it was stated openly on the floor of the House that it was the opinion of the commission that these transcontinental railroads came under the interstate-commerce act, subjecting them to the provisions of section 11. It was unquestionably this provision that instigated the British protest, and in complete substantiation of this contention attention is directed to several most significant facts.

The first mention of the American canal act in the House of Commons was on June 18, 1912, reference to which is made in the following paragraph from the London Times of June 19, 1912:

"In the House of Commons yesterday Mr. Hewins (Hereford, opposing) asked the secretary of foreign affairs whether his attention had been called to the bill now pending in the House of Representatives of the United States which was designed to prohibit any vessel owned by a railway company subject to the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission from using any waterway, including the Panama Canal, and what British-owned and Canadian-owned steamship lines would be affected."

On June 25, 1912, the Canadian premier, Hon. Robert L. Borden, accompanied by other Canadian Government officials, including J. D. Hazen, minister of marine, C. J. Doherty, minister of justice, sailed for London. On the same boat was Sir William McKenzie, of the Canadian Northern Railroad.

In the Quebec Chronicle, under date of July 12, 1912, appeared the following significant cable, dated London, July 12:

"Since the arrival here of the Canadian premier, Hon. Robert L. Borden, the question of the regulations in regard to steamers owned by railroads has been taken up. Canada has protested to her home Government on the ground that these regulations are inimical to their interests. It is believed that it is this question which led to the request for the postponement of the consideration of the regulations, for although the British Government's attention has been drawn to it previously, the matter has been the subject of fuller discussion since the arrival of the Canadian minister, and some new points have been disclosed."

In certain papers of the United States, under date of July 5, 1912, appeared the following cable:

"LONDON, July 4, 1912.

"Robert L. Borden, Canadian premier, with his colleagues, J. D. Hazen, minister of marine; C. J. Doherty, minister of justice; and L. P. Pelletier, postmaster general, arrived here this afternoon. * * * Among the many subjects to be discussed between the Canadian statesmen and the British Government is that regarding the proposal of the Senate committee in Washington that no ship owned by a railway shall be allowed to use the Panama Canal.

Canadian officials acting for the transcontinental railroads of the Dominion obtained quick action, for four days later, July 8, 1912, the first British note of protest was sent.

COASTWISE EXEMPTION FIRST REGARDED AS UNIMPORTANT.

This record bears out what has been repeatedly charged, namely, that the British protest was inspired by the Canadian railroads, and that the coastwise exemption provision was at the outset regarded as unimportant, for in the first British note, dated July 8, 1912, after directing attention to certain objections to the proposed act, these words are used:

"As to the proposal that exemption shall be given to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, a more difficult question arises. If the trade could be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic which is reserved for United States vessels would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken."

Later His Majesty's Government, ascertaining that by vigorously protesting against the coastwise exemption clause powerful allies would be obtained in the United States, changed its policy and the later notes grew more positive in contending that the coastwise exemption was in violation of the treaty.

RAILROADS CHIEF BENEFICIARIES BY IMPOSITION OF TOLL ON COASTWISE TRAFFIC.

"We are assured," the majority declares, "that no benefit accrues to shippers, localities, or the people from this exemption, but that it goes to the benefit of the coastwise ships and nobody else."

As a matter of record, which a reference to the hearings will disclose, several shipowners declared that if tolls were imposed the amount would necessarily be added to the freight rate and eventually paid by the consumer.

No specious argument will convince shippers and consumers of the United States that a toll of $1.20 levied upon a ship of a net register capacity, say, of 8,000 tons, amounting to $9,600 each trip, will not be reflected upon freight rates, or that the chief benefits of repeal will not accrue to the railroads.

As so clearly stated by Gov. Woodrow Wilson when, as a candidate for President, he was addressing the farmers at Washington Park, N. J., upon the benefits of free tolls:

"We want water carriage to compete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure we are to get better rates through the canal than you would across the continent."

It should be borne in mind that the average ship, particularly in the coastwise trade and carrying general merchandise, infrequently goes to sea loaded to its full capacity. If, for instance, a ship half filled passes through the canal, the freight rate upon each ton of freight actually carried doubles, for the toll is exacted upon its net registered capacity whether filled or half filled. A lower rate can be made only when the ship is in ballast, carrying no freight. The rate on some commodities of great bulk, occupying much space, will be greater per actual ton than heavier commodities requiring less space.

COASTWISE EXEMPTION POLICY SIMILAR TO THAT ATTEMPTED IN LAST TARIFF ACT.

The policy of aiding American shipping, sought to be accomplished by the canal legislation of 1912, is a policy similar to that attempted by a section of the tariff bill of 1913, providing:

"That a discount of 5 per cent on all duties imposed by this act shall be allowed on such goods, wares, and merchandise as shall be imported in vessels admitted to registration under the laws of the United States."

Because American shipping would benefit, objections were raised by certain foreign nations, and under the present policy of this country a foreign protest was sufficient to set aside the law.

In the report of the minority, submitted in 1912 when the canal bill was reported, the question of the bearing of tolls upon freight rates throughout the country was fully discussed. The following extracts from that report are worthy of most careful and serious consideration:

WATER COMPETITION REGULATES RAIL RATES.

"In a comparatively few instances opposition to free tolls has developed in certain localities in the Middle West, based upon the erroneous assumption that any reductions in freight rates between the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards will give the Pacific, Gulf, and Atlantic coast cities an advantage over the Middle West cities in competing for the trade of the intermountain section of the West. There might be some ground for this assumption were it not for the fact that rail freight rates between the Middle West and the Pacific coast never exceed those between the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards, and are frequently lower. Any reduction in rail freight rates forced by sea competition between, say, New York and San Francisco is contemporaneously applied between Chicago, St. Paul, St. Louis, Kansas City, and, in fact, every city of the Middle West on the one hand and every Pacific coast city or town on the other. This always has been so—it always will be so. The selfish interests of the railroads serving the Middle West is the strongest possible guaranty of the perpetuity of this already well-established rate-making system. No road operating between St. Paul and Seattle will permit a lower rail rate to exist between New York and Seattle than exists between St. Paul and Seattle, otherwise St. Paul's trade would be captured by New York.

"Therefore if, by reason of free tolls to vessels in the coastwise trade, freight rates between New York and Seattle are $1.20 per ton less than they would be if tolls were charged, they will by the same measure be less between St. Paul and Chicago and Omaha and St. Louis and Kansas City on the one hand and Seattle and Portland and San Francisco and Los Angeles and San Diego on the other. It is not for the merchants, manufacturers, producers, and consumers of the Middle West to do other than to heartily favor free tolls. It is to be expected, however, that the railroads serving the Middle West, and for that matter the entire country, will strenuously oppose free tolls and with equal strenuosity advocate the highest tolls possible, the only limit being those charged contemporaneously through Suez. Inasmuch as rates between the entire country east of the Missouri River on the one hand and the intermountain section on the other are based upon the coast-to-coast rates, it is obvious that free tolls would be equally advantageous to this section as to all other sections of the country. Free tolls can not but minimize rail freight rates on all the manufactures of the Atlantic seaboard and the Middle West, the products of the great Mississippi Valley, and those of the Pacific coast, to the ultimate advantage of the producers and consumers throughout the entire country. Nor are reductions in rail rates the only advantages which the people of the great interior of our country are to reap from free tolls. They have even a more direct interest.

"Much of the commerce of the great Mississippi Valley will flow down the rivers which drain it to the Gulf and thence through the canal to the Pacific coast. Likewise Pacific coast products will, under free tolls, to a large extent eventually be distributed throughout the Middle West via her waterways. The completion of the Lakes to Gulf waterway project will make it not alone possible but practicable to exchange Pacific coast lumber for Lake Superior ore without either commodity touching the floor of a freight car. Every burden placed upon traffic through the canal impairs its usefulness as a competitive route and decreases its benefits to the American people."

TOLLS A SUBSIDY TO RAILROADS.

The levying of tolls on coastwise shipping would prove a subsidy to the railroads. The toll must necessarily be charged by the carrier through the canal by adding it to the freight rate, and therefore there can be no question but what it would be in line with railroad policy to secure the highest possible tolls on coastwise traffic through the canal.

It is contemplated to operate lines of barges on the Mississippi River and its tributaries to connect with coastwise steamers at New Orleans with the opening of the canal. The lower the toll the farther into the interior of the country will the benefits resulting from low freight rates be felt.

CANAL ACT PREVENTS AGREEMENTS AND COMBINATIONS AMONG COASTWISE SHIP OWNERS.

To allay the fear frequently expressed by those opposed to the policy of treating the Panama Canal as any other American waterway, that through agreements and combinations traffic might be controlled through the canal and the toll thus absorbed, attention is directed to section 11 of the canal act, which not only prohibits railroad-owned ships from operating through that waterway in competition with rail lines, but goes much further and prohibits any vessel engaged in the coastwise trade from passing through the canal, which ship "is owned, chartered, operated, or controlled by any person or company doing business in violation of the Sherman antitrust law and acts amendatory thereof."

This will result in the keenest competition among coastwise vessels in the canal trade, many independent lines having announced their intention, under the stimulus of the legislation, of engaging in the traffic.

INACCURACIES IN MAJORITY REPORT.

If the accuracy of all the statements of the majority can be gauged by the declaration that "it is probable that the coastwise ships will require about half of the lockage for the first five or six years," then little credence can be given to any part of the report. The testimony of the majority's own witness, Prof. Emory R. Johnson, the Government expert—employed at $1,000 per month and expenses—for the purpose of estimating traffic, and upon whose report toll rates were fixed, is in direct contradiction to this statement of the majority.

Prof. Johnson declared, and his statement can be found on page 698 of the printed hearings before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, 1912 (H. Doc. 680, 62d Cong., 2d sess.), that the estimated total of shipping that would utilize the canal by 1914–15, based on the most careful and painstaking computation, would amount to 10,500,000 tons at the time of the opening of the canal, and "that but 1,160,000 net register tons would be coast to coast traffic." (See statement of Prof. Johnson, committee hearings, p. 705.) In other words, the coastwise traffic, instead of constituting half the traffic, as the majority inaccurately states, will amount to but about 11 per cent.

REVENUE TO BE DOUBLE THE EXPENSE OF OPERATION AND MAINTENANCE.

Analyzing still further the figures of Prof Johnson, we can eliminate the estimated coastwise traffic and have remaining 9,340,000 tons, and collecting a toll of $1.20 upon this shipping we would have an annual revenue of $11,208,000, and, accepting the committee's estimate of $5,000,000 for the cost of operation, maintenance, sanitation, and civil government (which is $1,000,000 higher than estimated by Col. Goethals), we find that the revenue to be derived from the canal, with no tollgate in the path of our domestic trade, will be more than double the cost of operation, maintenance, sanitation, and civil government.

In view of these facts, all of which are easy of verification, the following statement of the majority is interesting as an evidence of self-impeachment:

"There is no reason to hope that the commerce using the canal for the first few years, though paying uniform tolls, will at the rate fixed pay more than the amount necessary to pay the expense of operation, government, and sanitation."

The suggestion is respectfully thrown out to the majority to further consult its expert, Prof. Johnson, and to carefully and understandingly peruse the committee hearings.

THE EXEMPTION OF AMERICAN COASTWISE SHIPS WILL ADD NO BURDEN TO BRITISH VESSELS.

The figures just quoted prove conclusively that the exemption from toll of American coastwise ships will not add one cent to the burden upon British or other foreign ships. The rate finally fixed by President Taft in his proclamation was based on a sum that would bring to the canal the greatest amount of traffic in competition with the Suez route and with points that might be reached via the Straits of Magellan in competition with the canal. The toll was fixed without reference to the coastwise exemption. The British contention, therefore, that the exemption imposes an unfair share of the burden of the upkeep of the canal upon His Majesty's Government falls to the ground.

THE BARD AMENDMENT.

Replying to the statement of the committee that—

"An effort was made when the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was ratified to amend in the Senate by reserving the right to discriminate, but it was overwhelmingly defeated. An ineffectual attempt has been made to discredit the plain record in that case, remembered by a great many men still living, by vague and indefinite assertions that the proposition was voted down because recognized as unnecessary under the language of the treaty."

The most complete and crushing reply to this assertion is the publication which follows of the views of Senators present when the treaty was ratified, whose ability and high standing completely refute the charge of the majority that statements which they have made, or now make for the first time, are "vague and indefinite assertions." This publication of the views of these Senators and ex-Senators will constitute a record difficult for the Members of the majority or anyone else to impeach.

In connection with the Bard amendment and the views about to be set forth, it might be well to recall that on the same day an amendment was offered (see S. Doc. 85, 57th Cong., 1st sess.) reserving the right of the United States to protect said canal in any way it might deem proper, and that this amendment was likewise rejected on roll call, because deemed unnecessary.

The following are views of Senators present when the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was pending and the Bard amendment offered. They were the representatives of the American people, who, having heard all the discussions, voted for the treaty with the firm conviction that we were not surrendering our rights of ownership or our power to regulate domestic commerce.

INTERPRETATION GIVEN TO HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY BY SENATORS PRESENT WHEN INSTRUMENT WAS PENDING BEFORE THE UNITED STATES SENATE AND THE BARD AMENDMENT WAS OFFERED.

[From CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, July 17, 1912.]

"Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, some time ago I started to say something in regard to the question of tolls charged on vessels passing through the Panama Canal, which was under discussion here the other afternoon when I was unfortunately absent. I now renew the attempt. The question of canal tolls has arisen in connection with representations made by the Government of Great Britain in regard to our rights in fixing tolls. It so happened that I was in London when the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made, and, although the draft was sent from this country, that treaty was really made in London. I mention this merely to show that I had some familiarity with the formulation as well as the ratification of that treaty. When the treaty was submitted by the President to the Senate it so happened that I had charge of it and reported it to the Senate.

"The second Hay-Pauncefote treaty, as Senators will remember, embodied in substance the amendments which the Senate had made to the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty. England had refused to accept these amendments, and then the second treaty was made embodying in principle all for which the Senate had contended.

"When I reported that treaty my own impression was that it left the United States in complete control of the tolls upon its own vessels. I did not suppose then that there was any limitation put upon our right to charge such tolls as we pleased upon our own vessels, or that we were included in the phrase 'all nations.'

"Mr. PAGE. But the point I wish to raise, and especially to call the attention of the Senator from New York to, is that at the time the amendment was being considered Mr. Bard—who, I think, was then a Senator from California—moved to strike out article 3 and substitute the following:

"'ART. III. The United States reserves the right, in the regulation and management of the canal, to discriminate in respect of the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade.'

"This amendment, after discussion before the Senate at that time, was voted down by a vote of 43 to 27.

"Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not desire to intrude upon the Senator's time, for I know he is in a hurry. But I intended, at the close of the speech of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], to call the attention of the senior Senator from Georgia to page 4 of the views of the minority in the House report on the House bill, where the following is stated:

"'With further reference to the Bard amendment, we have been granted authority to quote from a letter recently written by Senator Bard, in the course of which he states:

"'"When my amendment was under consideration it was generally conceded by Senators that even without that specific provision the rules of the treaty would not prevent out Government from treating the canal as part of our coast line, and consequently could not be construed as a restriction of our interstate commerce, forbidding the discrimination in charges for tolls in favor of our coastwise trade, and this conviction contributed to the defeat of the amendment."'

"He states there that 'it was generally conceded by Senators that even without that specific provision the rules of the treaty would not prevent out Government from treating the canal as part of our coast line.'

"Mr. O'GORMAN. That is in accord with the recollection of the Senator from Massachusetts.

* * * * * * *

"Mr. WORKS. The Senator from Connecticut has anticipated what I was about to say by reading from the records a statement made by Senator Bard with respect to his amendment and the reason why it was voted down.

"I simply wish to say that I have in my hand the original letter of Senator Bard making that statement—that the reason for voting down his amendment was that it was generally regarded by the Senate as unnecessary, and that that construction should be placed upon the treaty, irrespective of any amendment of that kind.

"Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

"Mr. O'GORMAN. Yes.

"Mr. CLAPP. In answer to the suggestions of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], I will say that I think it was quite generally understood then that the reason for voting down the proposition to authorize the fortification in express terms was that under the treaty we had the right to fortify without that particular provision. I know I was here at the time, although I do not recall all of the speeches. But while some of us voted insisting in some instances that these things should be explicit and in others voting with the majority upon the ground that they were covered anyhow, I believe, both with reference to the coastwise trade and especially with reference to the question of fortification, that many of the votes cast against those express provisions were cast upon the theory that without them we nevertheless had the right to do them.

"Mr. O'GORMAN. That the provisions were unnecessary?

"Mr. CLAPP. Yes; that they were unnecessary."

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, July 20, 1912.]

"Mr. LODGE. While I am on my feet, if the Senator will allow me, there is one other thing I should like to say. I said in my remarks a few days ago that my personal view was that we had the right to exempt American vessels from tolls. I did not go into the matter. I took a somewhat active part in the two Hay-Pauncefote treaties, as they are called. I voted against the Bard amendment. I voted against it in the belief that it was unnecessary; that the right to fix tolls, if we built the canal or it was built under our auspices, was undoubted. I know that was the view taken by the then Senator from Minnesota, Mr. Davis, who was at that time chairman of the committee. I certainly so stated on the floor. * * * I had that same view in regard to this treaty. I was familiar with the work that was done upon it in London at the time when it was concluded there and finally agreed to, and I was very familiar with it here. Although, as the Senator from Georgia correctly said, the question was not raised at that time, I personally have never had any doubt that the matter of fixing the tolls must necessarily be within our jurisdiction; and when I referred to our going to The Hague as useless I did not mean because our case was not a good one. I meant because in the nature of things we could by no possibility have a disinterested tribunal at The Hague. It would be for the interest of every other nation involved to prevent our fixing the tolls according to our own wishes.

"Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

"The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

"Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield.

"Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Massachusetts has just expressed a reason for his vote against what was known as the Bard amendment. Can the Senator inform us as to whether that was the general sentiment prevailing at that time among the Senators?

"Mr. LODGE. I can only say, Mr. President, that that was the view of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and it was my view; and, while I may be mistaken, I think on that vote the majority of the Senate followed the Committee on Foreign Relations.

"Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. As I understand, the vote was something like 27 to 43.

"Mr. LODGE. Yes.

"Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The question of the Bard amendment, to which the Senator refers, was brought up, and on account of its being in executive session and the debates not being available, I was unable to find any record showing what was the sentiment in that respect.

"Mr. LODGE. There is no record that will show that, of course; but I know that was my opinion and the opinion of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations at the time.

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, August 6, 1912.]

"Mr. PERKINS. I wish to state that Senator Davis, of Minnesota, was at that time chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. He was, as is conceded by all, an authority on international law and took the view stated by the Senator from New York and that stated by the Senator from Washington. There is no question about it, that the rules we did make were to govern other nations than ourselves.

"Mr. JONES. Mr. President, it seems to me it would be a great reflection upon the intelligence and patriotism of Senators who voted against those amendments to accept any different construction."

Hon. Thomas R. Bard (ex-Senator from California):

"When my amendment was under consideration it was generally conceded by Senators that even without that specific provision the rules of the treaty would not prevent our Government from treating the canal as part of our coast line, and consequently could not be construed as a restriction of our interstate commerce, forbidding the discrimination in charges for tolls in favor of our coastwise trade, and this conviction contributed to the defeat of the amendment."

Hon. J. B. Foraker (ex-Senator from Ohio):

"Without regard to what individual Senators may have thought, and looking only to a proper construction of the language employed in the treaty, President Taft was right when he concluded that, as a question of power, the United States Government had an unquestioned right, under the treaty, to make the discrimination with respect to our vessels engaged in our coastwise trade, that was made by the act President Wilson is asking Congress to repeal, and that there was no violation whatever of our treaty stipulation in making such discrimination.

"To yield to the objection now made will be equally a surrender, if not a betrayal, of most important rights.

"This is not a partisan question. Nothing connected with the construction of the Panama Canal has been partisan. Democrats and Republicans alike supported the treaty that was finally enacted before the canal was authorized, and Democrats and Republicans alike participated in the legislation necessary to carry out that great work; and Democrats and Republicans alike, forgetting party divisions and remembering only the interest of America, should stand together for the preservation of our right to carry out the great purpose of constructing and so operating the canal as to promote American interests of every kind and nature.

"According to my recollection this very question (of right to discriminate in favor of our own ships) was raised by an amendment offered to the treaty, which amendment was voted down overwhelmingly, because it was thought unnecessary to specify that a provision of such a character did not apply to us who were building the canal, and were to have with respect to it the usual rights of ownership and all the rights of regulation.

"And for the further reason that to exempt one class of ships would imply that other classes were not exempt."

Hon. Charles A. Towne (ex-Senator from Minnesota):

"I remember distinctly my own feeling about the matter at the time, which was that we retained under the treaty full sovereignty over the canal and over the incidents of its ownership and control, including the right to fortify and police it and to regulate its use by vessels of commerce, subject only to the condition that all other nations should be treated alike; and that this was the general understanding.

"What we may think wise and prudent to do in the management of the canal is, of course, a matter for expedient determination; but it would be the rankest cowardice and unpatriotism for us to permit the existence of any question at all as to our absolute right to do as we please consistently with the specific conditions of the treaty as to the equal treatment of foreign nations."

Hon. Marion Butler (ex-Senator from North Carolina):

"I can not agree with the position of those who contend that the "free-tolls" law is in violation of the spirit or the letter of the treaty. I remember that when the first section of the third article of the treaty was under consideration, which provides that the canal shall be open to the vessels of all nations on the same terms, that several Senators suggested the propriety of adding a provision expressly exempting our domestic commerce done through coastwise vessels.

"The prompt response to this proposition on the part of the Senators having the treaty in charge was that such an amendment was unnecessary, because the treaty was so understood by the contracting parties.

"The fact is that Congress has the power to say what tolls shall be charged our coastwise shipping through the canal and should exercise that power, and neither England nor any other country has anything to do with it.

"We can not afford to buy our peace from England at such a price."

Hon. George Turner (ex-Senator from Washington):

"My recollection of the view taken in the Senate at the time of the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is substantially similar to that of Senators LODGE, Bard, CLAPP, PERKINS, Davis, and others. I am certain the treaty would not have been ratified if there had been doubt in the mind of anybody that the treaty limited the United States in the use which it might make of its own canal for its own purposes. The fact that the canal was to be the exclusive property of the United States, and under its absolute control for all purposes of war and peace, subject, of course, to fair dealing as between all other nations, was the controlling factor in the ratification of the treaty. Of this there can be no doubt."

Hon. Thomas Kearns (ex-Senator from Utah):

"I am in thorough accord with the views of Senators LODGE, Bard, CLAPP, PERKINS, Davis, and others, and was I fortunate enough to be a Member of the Senate at the present time I would certainly support the idea of favoring our coastwise trade. I think it is a piece of imposition on the part of Great Britain to attempt to dictate what, if anything, we should charge for canal tolls to our own war vessels, transports, or coastwise ships. We built the canal with our money. We have a right to protect our own property and to use it for our own convenience, and I do not think we should be bound otherwise by any treaty obligations, except to give all foreign nations fair and just treatment, without discrimination, as one against the other.

"This is my attitude, and I fully believe that any other policy would be surrendering our rights at the dictation of British statesmen."

Hon. William J. Deboe (ex-Senator from Kentucky):

"I remember Senator Bard's amendment to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It has always been my understanding that under that treaty the United States had the right to regulate canal tolls. My best recollection is the Bard amendment to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was defeated because Senators were of the opinion that the amendment did not confer any right that the treaty did not grant to the United States.

"I know it has always been my contention that this country had the right to regulate canal tolls and to control the canal. I made such a statement in a speech in the Senate."

POSSIBLE BRITISH OBJECTIONS ANTICIPATED BY SENATOR DAVIS.

Senator Cushman K. Davis, chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, in reporting the draft of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to the Senate on April 5, 1900, evidently anticipating future attempts on the part of Great Britain to misinterpret the treaty, used this language:

"This sweeping modification of article 1 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, as to all its restrictions upon the right of the United States, under its auspices, to construct the canal and to have and enjoy all the rights, such as ownership, incident to its construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for its management and regulation, leaves no ground, substantial or conjectural, on which Great Britain could hereafter contend for any of the restrictions contained in that article (not expressly excepted) as remaining in force against the United States."

In the same report Senator Davis expresses the opinion, which has been widely quoted by those who take the British view, that in his belief we would not find it necessary to differentiate our rates of toll in favor of our own people in order to secure a very great profit on the investment. This was the personal view of Senator Davis regarding conditions as they then existed, with the meager information at hand, but would clearly imply that under his interpretation of the treaty we had the full right to do so if conditions were such as to make it advisable in order to assist our American merchant marine and to obtain for the people of the country the greatest possible benefit of this waterway as a regulator of freight rates. In any event this last reference to Senator Davis's report discusses only the policy and not our right to make an exemption in favor of our coastwise trade.

THE CASE OF OLSEN VERSUS SMITH.

The fact that the Supreme Court of the United States has rendered a decision clearly sustaining the well-founded contention that the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty are not applicable to vessels in the coastwise trade appears to be particularly disturbing to the majority, and a very ingenious argument is advanced in an attempt to prove that the decision does not apply. The decision, however, speaks for itself.

In this case (Olsen v. Smith, 195 U. S., 332) the question whether treaties with foreign countries affected our coastwise commerce was squarely before the Supreme Court of the United States and determined adversely to the contention of the majority of the committee.

In that case the duly State-licensed pilots of Galveston, Tex., brought suit for damages against certain unlicensed pilots for piloting in that port, and prayed for an injunction restraining them from operating without a license and in violation of the State laws concerning pilotage. These laws provided a rate to be paid for licensed pilotage by vessels engaged in the foreign trade, but exempted those engaged in "the coasting trade in any part of the United States." Section 1444 of the Revised Statutes of the United States also contained a provision exempting coastwise vessels from the operation of State pilotage laws.

The defendants set up several defenses, among others contending that—

"As the vessel in question was a British vessel coming from a foreign port, the State laws concerning pilotage are in conflict with a treaty between Great Britain and the United States, providing that—

"'No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States.'"

Ruling on this contention of the defendants that the exemption of vessels engaged in the coastwise trade was a discrimination violative of the treaty provision above set out, the Supreme Court of the United States held unequivocally that such exemption of vessels engaged in the coastwise trade did not concern vessels engaged in the foreign trade. The language of the decision is plain and emphatic as announced in the opinion rendered by then Justice, now Chief Justice, White:

"Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage, resulting from the law of the United States, nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law, concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and, therefore, any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of vessels of the United States in such trade."

The syllabus statement of the rule thus announced by the Supreme Court is as follows:

"A State pilotage law subjecting all vessels, domestic and foreign, engaged in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, but which exempts pursuant to law coastwise steam vessels of the United States, is not in conflict with provisions in the treaty between the United States and Great Britain to the effect that British vessels shall not be subject to any higher or other charges than vessels of the United States."

The ground upon which that decision rests is plain to see. It is simply that it is no concern of vessels engaged in the foreign trade what provisions or exemptions are made regarding the coastwise trade. By a law reaching back to the very beginning of the Government all foreign vessels are absolutely excluded from our coastwise trade. As they can not on any terms or in any event enter the coastwise trade, it is no concern of theirs what provisions are made regarding it. A general statement in a treaty regulatory apparently of all vessels can not be held to apply to vessels engaged in trade exclusively domestic and into which foreign vessels could not enter under any circumstances because prohibited by law. For that reason any privileges or benefits granted by a nation to its own vessels engaged exclusively in trade between its own ports is not a discrimination against vessels engaged in foreign trade.

SIMILARITY OF OLSEN CASE.

The remarkable similarity of the facts and conditions in the Olsen v. Smith case and that under consideration is apparent. In that case as in this it was urged that a law of the United States granting an exemption in favor of vessels engaged in the coastwise trade was in violation of a treaty. The exemption in that case was from pilotage charges; in the present case it is from toll charges. Certainly it can not be contended that there is any distinction between the cases in that regard.

In that case the language of the treaty bound this country not to impose any higher "duties or charges" on British vessels than on vessels of the United States in the same ports. But under the local law British vessels were required to pay pilotage charges while American vessels were completely exempt from such charges. "A plain violation of the treaty," the majority would say, but in effect the Supreme Court said: "No; for what we do or omit to do with regard to our coastwise trade is of no concern to any nation, for they can not complain with regard to a traffic in which they have no interest. No regulation, exemption, or privilege which we see fit to grant to our coastwise trade is a just subject of complaint, for it does not concern vessels engaged in the foreign trade."

LANGUAGE OF TREATY AS BROAD.

It will be observed the language of that treaty was as general, as broad, as all-embracing in its terms as that with which we have now to deal. It did not provide that vessels engaged in the coastwise trade were excluded from the terms of the treaty. The language was broad enough to include all American vessels. But the Supreme Court holds that coastwise vessels could not have been within the contemplation of the parties to the treaty, for the reason that one of the parties to the treaty was in nowise concerned with the coastwise trade. It is not a strained or forced or unreasonable interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that its application to the coastwise trade was not within the contemplation of the parties, for neither Great Britain nor any other foreign nation could enter into or have any interest in our coastwise trade.

This case is an authority which has never been questioned by Great Britain or any other foreign power. It is a clear-cut determination of the proposition that the general terms of a treaty regarding the rights of vessels have no application to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade from which foreign vessels are excluded by law.

LANGUAGE OF TREATY OF WASHINGTON NOT SIMILAR.

The majority endeavors to infer that language substantially similar to that employed in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is used in the treaty of Washington of 1871, relative to the use of the canals and channels of the Great Lakes, and that when Canada attempted to discriminate in the matter of tolls by a process of rebating we protested because of the words "on terms of equality" contained in the treaty. It will be noted that the majority carefully refrained from inserting the vital language of this treaty. To have done so would have completely demolished the argument. Article 27 of the treaty of Washington, following the words "on terms of equality," also adds "with the inhabitants of the United States." The treaty thus firmly and unequivocally states that it means, leaving nothing to inference. Great Britain, however, never admitted a violation of treaty rights, although because of retaliation on our part she ceased her objectionable practices.

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST AMERICAN VESSELS NOW PRACTICED BY GREAT BRITAIN.

Great Britain's contentions fall to the ground by the submission of proof of her continued discrimination in favor of British vessels, "in violation of a sacred treaty obligation." In 1815 the United States entered into a treaty with Great Britain to regulate commerce and navigation.

The second article of this treaty, still in force, provides:

"No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States, nor in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels."

It is apparent that this provision is more broad and comprehensive than the equality clause of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in including all vessels of either country, without distinction as to whether they are engaged in coastwise trade or transoceanic commerce.

If England's interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty holds good, then it is extremely difficult to reconcile, under the section quoted above, her discrimination in tonnage duties in favor of her own coasting vessels. The following figures are presented to show that such a discrimination exists.

These statistics are taken from the latest edition of Turnbull's Dock and Port Charges for the United Kingdom, a very reliable work, which is revised and authenticated by the various authorities. The three great ports of Bristol, Liverpool, and London will serve as good examples. Similar conditions prevail in other British ports.

BRISTOL.

Dues payable upon entering this port:

	s.	d.
For every vessel from ports in Africa, South America, the United States of America, the East and West Indies, all the ports within the Strait of Gibraltar, Portugal, Prussia, Russia, Spain without the Straits, and Sweden, per registered ton	1	1½
For every vessel trading from Ireland, Isle of Man, Scotland, or as a coaster outside the British Channel, the western limit of which is to be taken as a line drawn direct from St. Davids Head to Lands End, per registered ton		5
For every vessel trading as a coaster from ports in the Bristol Channel, not including vessels from Cardiff, Newport, or any other ports eastward of the Holms, per registered ton		3½

LIVERPOOL.

Dock tonnage rates on vessels:

	s.	d.
Class 1. Between St. Davids Head and Carlisle, including the island of Anglesea, and steam fishing vessels engaged in the fishing industry, per ton	0	2¾
Between Carlisle and the Mull of Galloway, including the Isle of Man, per ton		3
Class 2. Between the Mull of Galloway and Duncans Bay Head, including the Orkney Isles and all the islands on the western coast of Scotland and between St. Davids Head and the Lands End, including the Scilly Islands and the east coast of Ireland from Cape Clear to Malling Head, per ton		4½
Class 6. All ports on the east coast of North America, the West Indies, the east coast of South America to the northward of Rio la Plata, inclusive, all parts of the west coast of Africa and all islands to the northwest of the Cape of Good Hope, and all ports within the Mediterranean, including the Adriatic, the Black Sea and Archipelago, islands of St. Helena, Ascension, and the Cape de Verde Islands, per ton	1	4

DISCRIMINATION IN HARBOR RATES.

Harbor rates on vessels bear out the same discrimination. Those under class 2 pay ⅝d. per ton; those under class 3 pay ¾d. per ton; and those under class 6 pay 1½d. per ton, or exactly double.

Wharf rates are as follows: Class 2, 1½d. per ton; class 3, 1¾d. per ton; and class 6, 4d. per ton. This is a clear preference in favor of domestic coasting vessels as against vessels engaged in over-seas trade of 2½d. per ton. These figures for the port of Liverpool are good examples of the rigid discrimination in favor of the English coasting trade. American vessels engaged in over-seas commerce pay harbor rates of 33 cents per ton, while some coasters pay only 9 cents a ton, or a difference of 27 cents a ton in favor of the coaster.

Discrimination as practiced at the port of London is clearly set forth in an article in the Law Magazine and Review, an English publication, for November, 1912, an extract from which follows:

"Tonnage dues at the port of London are as follows: (1) For every vessel trading coastwise or entering inward or clearing outward from or to any place north of latitude 48° 30′ N., and between longitude 12° W. and 65° E. of Greenwich, for every voyage, both in and out, 1d. per ton. (2) For every vessel entering inward or clearing outward beyond those limits, 1½d. per ton. (3) For vessels under 100 tons which do not pass beyond the seaward limit of the port, a halfpenny per ton. (4) Coastwise vessels not exceeding 45 tons, vessels bringing corn coastwise, fishing smacks, and lobster and oyster boats are exempt from dues.

"This discrimination of 1 cent a ton for entering and clearing port in favor of coastwise vessels and against trans-Atlantic vessels may on first impression seem trifling, but when on calculation it is found that on a vessel of 5,000 tons this additional 1 cent per ton on entering and leaving port amounts to $50, it is evident that all sense of equality between ocean-going vessels and those employed in the home trade only is completely discarded.

"If England for a moment believed that the words 'British vessels' or 'vessels of the United States,' as used in the treaty of 1815, included, or was ever intended to include, coasting vessels, she would not have established and enforced differential rates at her various ports in favor of coasting vessels, for that would then be a flagrant violation of the rights secured to vessels of the United States under the treaty. Not only this, but such an interpretation on the part of England would afford the United States to justly demand that vessels of the United States pay the same dues and charges at British ports as are exacted from British vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, instead of those largely increased and heavier dues and charges that American vessels have to pay.

"But, in addition to this, Great Britain, by assent and ratification under circumstances similar to those that have arisen under the Panama Canal act, is not in a position to now insist on an interpretation of the equality clause of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty different from that in accordance with the established interpretation she herself has put upon the treaty of 1815 and of like clauses in other treaties."

If, therefore, the words "British vessels" and "vessels of the United States," as used in the treaty of 1815, do not include vessels engaged in the coasting trade, it is difficult to understand how the words "vessels of commerce of all nations," as used in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, does include them.

MEANING OF NEUTRALIZATION.

The majority, having signally failed to make out a case from the direct language of the treaty, harks back to the preamble, which declares that the "general principle of neutralization" shall not be impaired. The majority give to "neutralization" a strained and forced construction.

OPINION OF FORMER SECRETARY OF STATE OLNEY.

Addressing himself to this phase of the controversy, Hon. Richard Olney, Secretary of State under former President Grover Cleveland, in a paper read before the American Society of International Law, at a session held in Washington, April 25, 1913, said:

"Great stress is laid upon the preamble of the treaty and its reference to the neutralization of the canal, as defined in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which, it is claimed, compels the United States to forget that it is the owner of the canal, and, as regards its own vessels, forces it to look upon itself as a canal customer bound to pay for its use the regular tolls. It is elaborately argued that neutralization of this sort is a policy to which the United States has been committed from the earliest times.

"But the argument ignores necessary distinctions and fails to note that 'neutralization' of a canal describes a policy applicable as between the canal owners and customers of the canal, but in no way touches or restricts the canal owner's rights or the canal owner's policy as to the use of the canal by itself. The several phases of American opinion, official and otherwise, respecting the construction and control of the Isthmian Canal have already been pointed out. While merely in the position of a probable user of the canal, the United States always and consistently claimed that the terms and conditions of use should be the same for all comers, but in no way denied or disputed the inherent rights of the canal owner. Those rights, as already shown, are expressly recognized by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which allows the owner to fix terms at will for the use of the canal by States, withholding the protection to the canal given by the United States and Great Britain, and even permits the owner to deny to such States the use of the canal altogether. Since accepting its inevitable rôle of the canal builder and owner, the United States has always and consistently stood on its rights as such, and, beyond agreeing to the neutralization of the canal as between customers, has repudiated the idea of any control of the canal except its own.

"How clearly such is the case is shown by the briefest examination of the neutralization provided for in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the principle of which is not to be impaired by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. What sort of neutralization is it? First, the United States and Great Britain are to determine what are just and equitable charges for the use of the canal by their citizens or subjects; second, the canal shall be open on those same terms to citizens and subjects of other States; but, third, the citizens and subjects of other States shall have the benefit of those terms only if such other States grant the same protection to the canal as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford. Now, there is no element of this species of neutralization which the Hay-Pauncefote treaty leaves unimpaired, since the United States alone fixes reasonable and equitable rules for the canal traffic; since the canal may be used by all nations on no other condition than that they observe those rules; and since—as shown by the elimination from this treaty of article 3 of the unratified Hay-Pauncefote treaty of February, 1901—adherence to the treaty by the other powers is not to be invited. If by construing article 8 in connection with other articles of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty any controlling principle of neutralization is to be deduced, it is the simple requirement that the same terms shall be made to all customers of the canal, a requirement restricting the rights of the canal owner to just that extent and no more, and not disabling it from treating its own shipping in any way it sees fit."

A SUMMING UP.

To sum up, the passage of H. R. 14385 is objected to for the following reasons:

1. That it would reverse our traditional policy of an American-controlled canal.

2. That it would surrender valuable American rights without any attempt to settle through diplomacy or by arbitration.

3. That it would foreclose the right of this Government to pass through the canal without the payment of toll American battleships, revenue cutters, colliers, transports, and other Government craft.

4. That it would inaugurate a policy compelling this Government to surrender whenever a foreign power gives an interpretation to a treaty contrary to that held by the United States; would compel us to abrogate our treaty with the Republic of Panama and to repeal section 11 of the canal act, which seeks to prevent railroad-owned ships from operating through the waterway in competition with their rail lines.

5. That it would benefit chiefly the transcontinental railroads.

6. That it would be a compliance with the demands of the Canadian railroads, which were the instigators of the British protest.

7. That it would give an interpretation to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty wholly at variance with the interpretation given to that instrument by Senators present when the treaty was ratified.

8. That it would be an abandonment of our historic policy of free commercial intercourse between the States.

9. That it would be an interpretation of the treaty as affecting coastwise traffic contrary to the rules laid down by the Supreme Court in the Olsen case.

10. That it would be an admission that Great Britain could favor British vessels, as His Majesty's Government now does, in port charges, while the United States would be barred from according different treatment to its coastwise ships.

CONCLUSION.

In concluding its report the majority declares:

"Far better to abolish the canal itself than ever to permit our national honor to remain in question."

This statement should be thus paraphrased:

"Far better to abolish the canal itself than to surrender its control to a foreign power."

Such a course would be a national dishonor. To acquiesce now in the demands of Great Britain after this Government, speaking through a former Secretary of State, has upheld the American position, would be nothing less than an act of national cowardice.

Heretofore our canal policy has been a vigorous American policy. An examination of the messages of former Presidents upon this subject, extracts from which are appended to this report, clearly show that never before in our history have we tolerated foreign interference in this great American project.

It is one of the greatest achievements of this country, and no other nation has aided. Great Britain, upon whom the burden of proof rests, has not made out a case. It is presumptuous for any nation to demand all the benefits of a partnership and be unwilling to assume a single burden. We have reached a crisis in our history.

J. R. KNOWLAND.

A VIGOROUS AMERICAN CANAL POLICY ADVOCATED BY FORMER PRESIDENTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

PRESIDENT PIERCE.

It would be difficult to suggest a single object of interest, external or internal, more important to the United States than the maintenance of the communication by land or sea, between the Atlantic and Pacific States and Territories. It is a material element of the national integrity and sovereignty. (President Pierce in message to Congress, May 15, 1856.)

PRESIDENT BUCHANAN.

The Government of the United States can never permit these routes to be permanently interrupted, nor can it safely allow them to pass under the control of other rival nations. It can never consent to be made tributary to their use to any European power. (President James Buchanan in message to the United States Senate, Apr. 5, 1860.)

PRESIDENT HAYES.

The policy of this country is a canal under American control. The United States can not consent to the surrender of this control to any European power or to any combination of European powers. * * * The United States must exercise such control as will enable this country to protect its national interests. * * *

An interoceanic canal across the American Isthmus will essentially change the geographical relations between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of the United States and between the United States and the rest of the world. It would be the great ocean thoroughfare between our Atlantic and our Pacific shores, and virtually a part of the coast line of the United States. Our merely commercial interest in it is greater than that of all other countries, while its relations to our power and prosperity as a nation, to our means of defense, our unity, peace, and safety, are matters of paramount concern to the people of the United States. No other great power would, under similar circumstances, fail to assert a rightful control over a work so closely and vitally affecting its interest and welfare.

Without urging further the grounds of my opinion, I repeat, in conclusion, that it is the right and the duty of the United States to assert and maintain such supervision and authority over any interoceanic canal across the Isthmus that connects North and South America as will protect our national interests. This, I am quite sure, will be found not only compatible with but promotive of the widest and most permanent advantage to commerce and civilization. (President Rutherford B. Hayes in message to Congress, Feb. 10, 1880.)

PRESIDENT GRANT.

In accordance with the early and later policy of the Government, in obedience to the often-expressed will of the American people, with a due regard to our national dignity and power, with a watchful care for the safety and prosperity of our interests and industries on this continent, and with a determination to guard against even the first approach of rival powers, whether friendly or hostile, on these shores, I commend an American canal, on American soil, to the American people. * * *

During my administration of the Government I endeavored to impress upon the country the views I then formed, and I shall feel that I have added one more act of my life to those I have already recorded if I shall succeed in impressing upon Congress and the people the high value as a commercial and industrial enterprise of this great work, which, if not accomplished by Americans, will undoubtedly be accomplished by some one of our rivals in power and influence. (Signed article by former President Grant, appearing in the North American Review, February, 1881.)

PRESIDENT ARTHUR.

The questions growing out of the proposed interoceanic waterway across the Isthmus of Panama are of grave importance. * * * This Government learned that Colombia had proposed to the European powers to join in a guaranty of the neutrality of the proposed Panama Canal—a guaranty which would be in direct contravention of our obligation as the sole guarantor of the integrity of Colombian territory and of the neutrality of the canal itself. My lamented predecessor felt it his duty to place before the European powers the reasons which make the prior guaranty of the United States indispensable and for which the interjection of any foreign guaranty might be regarded as a superfluous and unfriendly act. (President Arthur, in message to Congress, Dec. 6, 1881.)

PRESIDENT M'KINLEY.

That the construction of such a maritime highway is now more than ever indispensable to that intimate and ready intercommunication between our eastern and western seaboards demanded by the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands and the prospective expansion of our influence and commerce on the Pacific, and that our national policy, now more imperatively than ever, calls for its control by this Government, are propositions which I doubt not the Congress will duly appreciate and wisely act upon. (President McKinley, in message to Congress, Dec. 5, 1898.)

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT.

I believe that the position of the United States is proper as regards this coastwise traffic. I think that we have the right to free bona fide coastwise traffic from tolls. I think that this does not interfere with the rights of any other nation, because no ships but our own can engage in coastwise traffic, so that there is no discrimination against other ships when we relieve the coastwise traffic from tolls. I believe that the only damage that would be done is the damage to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Moreover, I do not think that it sits well on the representatives of any foreign nation, even upon those of a power with which we are, and I hope and believe will always remain, on such good terms as Great Britain, to make any plea in reference to what we do with our own coastwise traffic, because we are benefiting the whole world by our action at Panama, and are doing this where every dollar of expense is paid by ourselves. In all history I do not believe you can find another instance where as great and expensive a work as the Panama Canal, undertaken not by a private corporation but by a nation, has ever been as generously put at the service of all the nations of mankind. (Extract from letter of Theodore Roosevelt in Outlook, Jan. 18, 1913.)

PRESIDENT TAFT.

I am very confident that the United States has the power to relieve from the payment of tolls any part of our shipping that Congress deems wise. We own the canal. It was our money that built it. We have the right to charge tolls for its use. Those tolls must be the same for everyone. But when we are dealing with our own ships the practice of many governments in subsidizing their own merchant vessels is so well established in general that a subsidy equal to the tolls, or an equivalent remission of the tolls, can not be held to be a discrimination in the use of the canal. Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the remarks of the gentleman from California [Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND], in which he quoted Senator LODGE on the 20th of July, 1912, saying that he voted against the Bard amendment because he thought that the right to fix tolls was already in the treaty, I wish to put into the RECORD the Senate debate of July 17, 1912, three days earlier. It shows that Senator LODGE had at the time forgotten the discussion over the Bard amendment. Much as I admire the Senator, I can not believe that his memory of what happened a dozen years before was any better evidence on July 20, 1912, than on July 17, 1912. The debate of July 17, to which I refer, was as follows:

Mr. LODGE. When I reported that treaty my own impression was that it left the United States in complete control of the tolls upon its own vessels. I did not suppose then that there was any limitation put upon our right to charge such tolls as we pleased upon our own vessels, or that we were included in the phrase "all nations." But I see very plainly, Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me before he passes from that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CUMMINS in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. BACON. I happened to be here at that time myself and also to be on the Foreign Relations Committee with the Senator. I want to ask the Senator if he can recall that either in the committee or in the Senate there was at any time an assertion of the opinion of Senators that that was the construction of the treaty? Does the Senator recall that that ever was asserted?

Mr. LODGE. You mean that we should have the right to determine the tolls?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. I do not recall now that the question was ever raised.

Mr. BACON. I do not think it was.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. On page 16, if the Senator will allow me, of pamphlet 85——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the junior Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Georgia. What pamphlet is it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is Document No. 85 of the Fifty-seventh Congress. This was a motion offered apparently in the Senate in connection with the treaty of December 13, 1900, which, after being amended by the Senate, I understand was not approved by Great Britain. On page 16 it seems that this amendment was offered:

"The United States reserves the right in the regulation and management of the canal to discriminate in respect of the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade."

I find that the Senate even rejected this, voting yeas 27, nays 43. I wanted to ask the Senator——

Mr. LODGE. That refers to the first treaty.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. BACON. That I had in mind, of course. If I recollect aright, it was Senator Bard's amendment. I will not stop to explain it now, but my vote in favor of it was not on the ground that I favored free ships. But in view of the Senator's statement that he reported the bill, which was a fact, and indicating his familiarity with it, I wanted to ask him what his then construction of it was, whether he could recall that in the process of the making of that treaty, either while it was in committee or in the Senate, it was ever asserted by anyone as the proper construction of that treaty.

Mr. LODGE. I do not remember that any construction either one way or the other was asserted.

Mr. BACON. I do not either. I quite agree with the Senator in that regard, and it was for that reason that I asked the question.

Mr. LODGE. I mentioned merely my own impression, which was that it left the fixing of tolls to us, but it is very clear to anyone on the simple reading of the clause that the interpretation is open to doubt. I think on the face of the words either view can fairly be taken. Such being the case, Mr. President, I do not wish anything done by which this Government could ever be exposed to the suggestion even of not acting in good faith under a treaty. I think we should be most punctilious, even if there is nothing more than a doubt about a word, in carrying out the treaty strictly to its letter.

It is, of course, also true, as the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] pointed out, that if we should undertake simply to make our ships free, we should raise a question which would then, under our treaties of arbitration, necessarily go to The Hague.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Speaker, the fathers of cloture in this House and the sponsors of the gag rule on both sides of the aisle are protesting against the rule to bring this bill before the House for consideration on the grounds that the rule precludes the right of amendment. I have always voted in favor of this right; but there is a difference in this rule from other rules brought in the House and in this from other legislation. There is here but one question, one single subject matter, one single proposition. It is to be answered by yes or no. This law must stand or it must fall. It must remain a law or be repealed. It is a single, indivisible proposition, an entirety.

There is no multitude of items, provisions, or conditions involved in this bill to be modified or changed by amendment, such as are included in a tariff bill with thousands of items, in a currency bill with thousands of provisions and conditions, or in an appropriation bill with varied amounts and a multiplicity of conditions of payment and limitations of expenditures. It involves a vital and paramount question of foreign policy and international expediency. The question is yes or no, repeal or not repeal, tolls or no tolls, yea or nay.

There is no principle of the Democratic Party more firmly established than the principle of opposition to ship subsidies and all subsidies, as well as all gift from the Public Treasury, all payments without service performed or value received, and all taxation of the people for the benefit of the few.

This principle is fundamental. It dates from the very inception of Democracy. It is the foundation stone of equal rights to all and special privileges to none. This time-honored policy has been reaffirmed in every platform in the last 50 years touching upon the principle of subsidies and special privileges. It was reaffirmed in the platform of 1888 in the following unequivocal language:

Free ships and a living chance for American commerce on the seas and on the land. No discrimination in favor of transportation lines, corporations, or monopolies.

And in the platform of 1884 it was reaffirmed by a declaration in substance favoring the encouragement of the merchant marine by freedom of trade relations between nations and not otherwise.

In 1888 subsidies was not an issue, nor in 1892 nor in 1896 nor in 1900.

It was specifically reaffirmed in the platform of 1904 in the following language:

We denounce the ship-subsidy bill recently passed by the United States Senate as an iniquitous appropriation of public funds for private purposes and a wasteful, illogical, and useless attempt to overcome by subsidy the obstructions raised by Republican legislation to the growth and development of American commerce on the sea.

We favor the upbuilding of a merchant marine without new or additional burdens upon the people and without bounties from the Public Treasury.

The same principle was reaffirmed in the platform of 1908 as follows:

We believe in the upbuilding of the American merchant marine without new or additional burdens upon the people and without bounties from the Public Treasury.

The same was reaffirmed in the platform of 1912 as follows:

We believe in fostering, by constitutional regulation of commerce, the growth of a merchant marine which shall develop and strengthen the commercial ties which bind us to our sister republics of the south, but without imposing additional burdens upon the people and without bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury.

It is true that the platform of 1912 contained the following subsequent clause:

We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

These two clauses, one opposing ship subsidy in clear expressed and unequivocal terms, and the other favoring ship subsidy disguised, hidden, and concealed under the cloak of free tolls are inconsistent declarations and in hopeless and irreconcilable conflict. Both can not be given effect. One must stand and the other must fall.

Toll exemption is a ship subsidy pure and simple. It makes no difference whether payments are made from the Public Treasury or payments which are due the Public Treasury are remitted, the result is the same upon the Treasury, the same upon the private interests to be benefited and the same upon the taxpayers. In principle and in fact they are identical. Free tolls is a ship subsidy under a false label and disguised to secure the indorsement of what had always been condemned and repudiated by the Democratic Party.

To ask that the Democratic Party desert its ancient policy of opposition to subsidies and abandon its declarations for a century and to indorse free tolls would be to ask the mariner to disregard the polar star and look to the treacherous ignis fatuus, the fox fire and jack-o'-lanterns of the sea, in guiding the ship of state.

Democrats are not bound to accept a ship subsidy because thrust upon them in disguise and under a false label. Democrats are not bound to accept a ship subsidy because it was allowed to creep into the platform through inadvertence and oversight. But Democrats are bound under their platform and time-honored policy to denounce and repudiate this ship subsidy as soon as its true character is known and revealed, and now is the time and here is the place to vindicate the policy of the Democratic Party and its devotion to the principle of equal rights to all and special privileges to none.

The plank in the Baltimore platform was made a part of the resolutions of that convention without notice, without attention, without debate or consideration in any manner. It went in by stealth and in disguise and, like a wolf in sheep's clothing, was welcomed until its true character was revealed and its antagonism to the flock of Democratic principles was discovered; and now it is to be driven out by the shepherd to protect the fold.

After a careful study of all the circumstances leading up to this movement for the exemption of tolls, I am convinced that the one most important factor in directing this policy and influencing our attitude toward our treaty obligation was the coastwise shipping interest. These great ship lines enjoyed a monopoly of the coastwise trade under a policy of the governmental favoritism. They had divided out the ports of the country among themselves, so that only one line entered any port. Competition was destroyed and monopoly was complete. Shippers were everywhere subjected to extortion which in the last analysis is collected from the consuming public.

But commercial greed and avarice are never satisfied. They are always grasping for more. They were not satisfied with a monopoly of the coastwise trade. They were not satisfied with dividing off the ports of the country and destroying competition in transportation.

Looking to still greater profits, through monopoly and Government favoritism, they saw in the construction of the Panama Canal a saving of 10,000 miles of travel while holding the same monopoly of transportation. The Government that had given them the power to collect extortionate freight rates from the people of the United States is now to be induced to make the Panama Canal subservient to their use, and the expenditure of $400,000,000 by the people taken advantage of to further add to the profits of favoritism which they already enjoy.

The lobby of to-day does not depend for its control of legislators upon common bribery and corruption. The lobby of to-day does not rely upon such means and methods to influence legislation. The lobby of to-day is not in Washington, but operates with headquarters in some far-away city. The lobby of to-day is without a special force or organization at the Capitol, except to maintain an agency to report the status of bills and the attitude of Members. The lobby of to-day does not pursue a general system solely of approaching men to tempt them with bribes and money. The lobby of to-day acts and proceeds on the theory that Members of Congress are largely if not wholly controlled by the sentiment and advice coming from their districts and the country at large. The lobby of to-day directs from a central headquarters an insidious campaign of education among the constituents of Members to create sentiment and public opinion, with a view to reflecting the same upon their representatives and thereby to control their action in legislation.

Every Member of Congress knows that a great part of the mail which comes to him daily bearing petitions and letters assuming to voice the personal sentiments of the writer or the public opinion of the locality from which sent is not, in fact, a reflection of the true sentiment of the writer or the public opinion of the locality from which the same comes.

Such has been the character and system of the activities of the coastwise ship lobby to mold public opinion, shape political platforms, and influence legislation in favor of exempting the payment of tolls. Following this line of stealth and strategy, speakers have been before societies, clubs, orders, commercial bodies, and boards of trade. Prepared resolutions have been presented before such societies and bodies and their passage and their indorsement influenced. Prepared editorials have been furnished newspapers and their publication secured. Prepared form letters have been circulated among citizens generally purporting as coming voluntarily from a disinterested and public-spirited source and as appealing to patriotism and national pride.

All of these movements have been with the object and design to create a false sentiment and public opinion and to reflect the same upon the Member of Congress by having such editorials, resolutions, petitions, and letters presented to the Member as representing the individual sentiment and the public judgment of his district and the country at large. This is the insidious lobby which flooded the country with pamphlets, circulars, petitions, form resolutions, and letters in 1912 and which created the false sentiment and made-to-order public opinion that secured the passage of the toll-exemption bill by a majority of Republicans and minority of Democrats. This lobby has again become active, and the movement manifest here to delay action in Congress is to give time to manufacture public opinion and reflect a made-to-order sentiment upon this Congress to prevent the repeal of this law.

There are two steps taken by this Government in relation to the Panama Canal which should be retraced—one relates to the means and methods by which we acquired the Panama territory, and the other relates to the acquisition of the right to construct the canal and the action of Congress in construing the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and granting free tolls to the coastwise ships.

Passing over the preliminaries which lead up to the negotiations with Colombia, we come to the acquisition of the canal territory. Colombia, while expressing her willingness to treat with us, declined to accept our offer. Congress paused for further negotiations. In the meantime the administration in power, without waiting, proceeded to steal Panama and rob Colombia. Pardon me, I must not say steal or rob, because those terms are only applicable to the weak and defenseless and those who take food to sustain life or clothing to protect the naked body against the elements. Those terms are not applicable to the strong who take for power and profit. I will say we proceeded to seize Panama and to appropriate Panama. We proceeded to do with a little nation what we would not have done with a big nation. We proceeded to do with a weak nation what we would not have done to a strong nation. We proceeded to do with weak and defenseless Colombia what we would not have done with England or Germany or France or any formidable naval power of the world. We coerced the weak and defenseless.

But this was not all. We were the sponsors of the Monroe doctrine, under which we assumed to protect Colombia from foreign aggression. We had assumed a fiduciary relation toward her, the relationship of guardian and ward, and we committed the most nefarious and heinous crime against her to be found in all the decalogues of international offenses. We violated our own ward. But more than this, we had entered into a solemn treaty obligation with Colombia in 1846, under which we guaranteed to Colombia jurisdiction and property in the Panama Canal territory. This treaty was at this time in full force and a subsisting obligation. We repudiated our solemn treaty of obligations toward her; but black as this record is, it is blacker still. We can not even claim credit for boldness in crime or open criminality. With ostrich shrewdness and to hide our conduct from the gaze of the civilized world, we recognized a revolution which had no tangible existence, and forbade Colombia to maintain peace and order in her own territory. We have been accused of exciting this revolution and of aiding it and abetting it and conspiring with its leaders, and we have not been able up to this time to successfully defend against this accusation.

We stand charged to-day before the world not only with force in the acquisition of the canal territory, the coercion of the weak, the violation of our own ward, the repudiation of our solemn treaty obligations, but of despicable fraud in the acquisition of that territory.

If this record of coercion, violation of the weak and defenseless, repudiation of treaty obligations, and fraud shall stand as the American policy toward the South American Republics, where will the Monroe doctrine lead us, where will force and fraud end in the policy of nations, where is the security of the weak against the strong, where are we outrivaled in the rule that might makes right?

This is the blackest page in American history, and this Nation must live long in humble atonement to survive the stain and stigma upon our fair name, to lift this defamation from our character, to appease the shocked conscience of the civilized world, and to silence this appalling national scandal.

But thanks to an intervening Providence in the affairs of nations, thanks to an honest administration, thanks to a just administration, thanks to a God-fearing administration, thanks to Bryan and Wilson, we are now to atone for this coercion and this violation of the defenseless, so far as it is within the power of man to atone for wrongs inflicted, and we are to pay Colombia for the forcibly seized property.

The other step we should retrace is our action relative to the treaty under which we obtained the consent of other nations and the right to construct this canal.

Here are the words of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, guaranteeing the use of the canal to the ships of all nations on equal terms and without discrimination in respect to charges, under which the coastwise shipping interests claim the right to demand exemption of the payment of tolls:

> The canal shall be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

The common and accepted meaning of these words preclude on their very face the discrimination and favoritism contended for by the coastwise shipping interests. These words have not only been given a construction which violates their plain, ordinary, and common accepted meaning, but a construction against that given by every other nation of the world. And more than this, we have refused to submit the treaty for decision by a court of arbitration under the principles of equity and international justice or to consent to a judicial construction of the terms used in accordance with their international import.

We have by such refusal admitted to the world that we can not justify our construction by any rule of international interpretation and that force and might is our only defense. Such is our record and such is our position before the world to-day. We are without either a just cause or a technical defense for a bad cause.

Such construction is a technical subterfuge and a transparent fraud, and shows to what depths of dishonor and national shame this monopoly would drag the American flag to increase profits and extort from the people.

These interests would now abrogate treaties and solemn national obligations and jeopardize national peace and drench the world in blood to make monopoly complete. If we persist in such a policy, we can not build enough warships or equip enough armies to protect our shores from invasion or to appease the wrath of the outraged sense of international justice.

But Providence, through a just administration, is to intervene again to save our fair name from being dragged to the depths of repudiation by commercialism and greed for profits and selfish gain. This bill will wipe out this great national disgrace so far as it is within human power to restore that which has already been tarnished.

With flaunting challenge the question has been asked, "Whose canal is this?" We answer it belongs to all the people and not a special few. We answer it belongs to all the taxpayers and not a few shipowners. We answer it belongs to this Government and not to a monopolistic shipping combine. We answer it belongs to all the men who are taxed to pay for it and not to the few men who seek to use it free for profit and extort from its owners.

All the people have built this canal at a cost of many millions of dollars. All the people will maintain this canal at a cost of many millions of dollars. All the people will operate this canal at a cost of many millions of dollars, and the men who wish to take advantage of this great transportation system for profit should pay the people for the use of their property. We deny the right to tax all the people for the benefit of the few. We deny the right to use public property for private benefit. We deny the right to levy public taxes to be diverted for selfish, personal ends.

The Panama Canal is a Government-owned transportation system. It is immaterial whether a transportation system be a system of water transportation or a system of transportation by rail. The same principles govern and apply. If the coastwise shipping interest can claim the right to be piloted through the Panama Canal by the Government without charge, they can claim the same right to have freight cars hauled over any Government-owned railway which may be hereafter constructed. If the United States should construct a transcontinental railway between New York City and San Francisco at the cost of $400,000,000, more or less, the coastwise shipping interest or any other domestic transportation company could claim the right to have their freight cars carried over that railway by the Government, if they can now demand that the United States shall construct a canal or a water transportation system and admit their ships to free passage.

But for what is this great sacrifice of national honor, credit, and good will? For what is this great travesty upon international justice? For what is this desertion of the time-honored principles of the Democratic Party opposing ship subsidy and the abandonment of the very foundation policies upon which Democracy rests? What end justifies such means?

Can we justify this coercion of the weak and the defenseless, the violation of our own ward, the policy of force and might, and the repudiation of our solemn treaty obligations, all to tax the many for the benefit of the few, all to expend $400,000,000 to construct the canal, and millions of dollars to maintain it, and millions of dollars to operate it, for the special use of those engaged in the monopoly of coastwise transportation? [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, at the instance of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS], who requested me to do so out of his time, I yield now to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY] 15 minutes.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Speaker, the concluding paragraph of the Democratic national platform is in the following significant words:

> Our pledges are made to be kept when in office as well as relied upon during the campaign.

[Applause.]

That is the concluding paragraph of a platform which declares unequivocally in favor of free tolls for coastwise traffic through the Panama Canal. It is significant and very gratifying to know that the position of the Democratic Party on that important question was confirmed and ratified by the other two great parties of this country, the Progressive and Republican Parties; by the Progressive Party, if you please, in a more emphatic manner, declaring for the right of free tolls through the Panama Canal for our own ships, and even though it be said by my distinguished colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], that the Republican Party was silent in its platform upon the question, I am pleased to know that reference has been made by another speaker since he took his seat, calling attention to the fact that ex-President Taft has been always unequivocally in favor of free tolls for American ships. [Applause.] It was only the other day that he was interviewed as to the pending question in this House. At that time he said:

> I am reluctant to take any part in this controversy, but I expressed my opinion on the matter of canal tolls in an official memorandum attached to the Panama Canal act, and I have seen no reason to change my views there expressed.

Ex-President Roosevelt was equally emphatic in the Outlook, January 18, 1913, when he wrote:

> I believe that the position of the United States is proper as regards this coastwise traffic. I think that we have the right to free bona fide coastwise traffic from tolls. I think that this does not interfere with the rights of any other nation, because no ships but our own can engage in coastwise traffic, so that there is no discrimination against other ships when we relieve the coastwise traffic from tolls. I believe that the only damage that would be done is the damage to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Moreover, I do not think that it sits well on the representatives of any foreign nation, even upon those of a power with which we are, and I hope and believe will always remain, on such good terms as Great Britain, to make any plea in reference to what we do with our own coastwise traffic, because we are benefiting the whole world by our action at Panama, and are doing this where every dollar of expense is paid by ourselves. In all history I do not believe you can find another instance where as great and expensive a work as the Panama Canal, undertaken not by a private corporation but by a nation, has ever been as generously put at the service of all the nations of mankind.

SAME INDIVIDUAL WITH SAME CONVICTIONS.

I dislike to differ with the President of the United States, one of the greatest Presidents this country has ever seen. I bow to his magnificent statesmanship in many matters. It has been the marvel of the country, the many things he has accomplished for the public good in so incredibly a short period of time; but let me say to my colleagues here that it is a keen satisfaction to me to know that I am in harmony with myself, and I find myself the same individual, with the same convictions, with the same notions, and with the same judgments that characterized my action in this House of May 23, 1912, and there I propose to stand. [Applause.] I believe it was Napoleon who once defined history as "a lie agreed upon." I wonder how we shall characterize Democratic platforms in the future? Shall we look upon them as traps for the unwary; shall we look upon them as springes to catch woodcocks, to catch people with a promise, only to be ready to default when the opportunity comes for the execution of the word that we have given to the American people?

The repudiation of the platform is either an indictment of the intelligence of those who framed it or else a bold scuttle without rhyme or reason.

LIVING COST INCREASED.

Something has been said in this Chamber and said very emphatically by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] about the shipping trust. I will ask the gentleman from Texas how about the railroad trust? [Applause.] Is it not a fact that the transcontinental railways have always opposed the building of the Panama Canal? Is it not a fact that to-day they oppose free tolls for American shipping through the canal, and why? Simply because they do not want any competition in the making of freight rates. It has been said here before, but I wish to emphasize it, that it is a peculiar thing that Democrats should be found fighting against a law which proposes to lift a tax from the people. We propose by adhering to this law to untax industry by not placing a tax upon the ships going through the Panama Canal. Why? Because we know it is a Democratic doctrine. We have preached it always and forever that the consumer pays the freight. It is not the man who primarily pays the tax who bears it. He sees to it that the man away down in the scale of human life is the man upon whom is visited the taxation, and I say to you—to you Democrats who have been shouting your heads off—"we will reduce the cost of living," repeal the free tolls, and you go about in a certain definite way to increase the cost of living to the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I will not. I have not the time. My time is too brief. Fearing that there might be overstatement about these railways and the monopolies of the railways, let me call attention to a speech of Senator FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS in the Senate on the 22d of January, 1913. He then said:

> Now, Mr. President, what is the occasion of this difficulty? What has been the difficulty all the way through with reference to the Panama Canal? Our difficulty has always been the opposition of the transcontinental railway carriers of the country, determined, first, to prevent interoceanic communications and then to paralyze it by the burdens imposed upon it. It was for this reason that for years they prevented and delayed the inauguration of the canal enterprise, and later on, as its completion approached, they sought to induce us to permit ships owned by transcontinental railroads to traverse the canal, knowing very well from past experience that through their ownership of ships subsidized by profits from the rail traffic they could paralyze water transportation. Then, having failed in that, they were eager to have us impose a burden upon the domestic transportation between the two coasts in the shape of tolls, such burdens as all the other water transportation of the United States is entirely free from.

THE SANTA CLAUS OF NATIONS.

Similar speeches were made in the Senate bearing testimony to the attitude of the transcontinental railroads on this proposition. If you repeal this law, you take my word for it that the nations of the world will laugh at our weakness and at our foolishness. [Applause.] The proposed legislation is altruism run mad. Perchance those nations may grow to love us. Why should they not? Spend $400,000,000 of good American money for their benefit, denying the primary benefits to ourselves! [Applause.] I presume, facetiously speaking, that we will become known to the nations of the world as the Santa Claus of nations, bearing gifts for others and forgetting the genius that made possible the Panama Canal, forgetting the sacrifice of life, forgetting the aspirations and the hopes of the American people for an enlarged commerce.

Why have we built it? The answer to that question was given by my colleague, I think the gentleman from Missouri, Hon. WILLIAM P. BORLAND, in a very emphatic manner in this House when the matter was under discussion before. He said:

> If the present bill, unamended and unmodified, becomes a law in relation to the Panama Canal, the net result is that we have spent $400,000,000 for no purpose on earth except to bring a battleship once in 40 years from the Pacific Ocean to the Atlantic in time of war.

Who shall question my statement that the nations shall rise up and call us blessed for our unbounded generosity?

A very significant feature of this controversy lies in the fact that after we here in the House had passed the bill, two months after we had passed it, after the Democratic national convention had indorsed the proposition, a note of protest was entered by Great Britain, as follows:

If trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that bona fide coastwise trade which is reserved for United States vessels would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken.

That was a recognition by protesting Great Britain of our right to exempt coastwise vessels from tolls passing through the canal. What is it that has caused such an amplification of the demands and protests of Great Britain? Why is it that instead of recognizing our right to exempt coastwise vessels, as she did in the beginning, she now comes out and says you can not exempt coastwise vessels? But, my friends, let us remember that in the beginning of 1913 this mooted question was in a fair way of adjustment through diplomatic channels, and, lo and behold, Senator ROOT arose in his place in the Senate and introduced a bill to repeal the Panama Canal act, and in support of that bill he made a speech three days afterwards arraigning this House as a lot of "sleepy heads." Oh, we had all gone to sleep in May, 1912; we were all drowsy when the Panama Canal act was being considered. Listen to him:

Members of both Houses were not working with full vigor. We were weary, physically and mentally. Such discussion as there was was to empty seats.

NATIONAL HONOR.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. ROOT] certainly was not weary. He was remembering not America, but Great Britain, when he introduced this bill to repeal the Panama Canal act. [Applause.] Let it be said to the credit of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the ever-watchful legislator, that he saw that speech, saw that statement made by Senator ROOT, and arose here in the House and brought to testify as a refutation the fact that we had been a very gingerly aggregation of Members when we considered it, and that we were attending in goodly numbers when we gave proper consideration to so important a question. Oh, but since that time the agitation has spread throughout the country. There has been a sort of insidious propaganda reaching here and there proclaiming to the world that we were guilty of a breach of national honor. I take a different conception of national honor from some gentlemen. To me national honor spells consideration for my own country first. [Applause.] National honor means to me to follow devotedly and unflinchingly an American fortified position. [Applause.] National honor means to me to remain true to the legislation of the Congress of the United States and to see that the burden is maintained by the nation that challenges our legislation. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] authorizes me to yield the gentleman five minutes additional.

RIGHTS OF SOVEREIGNTY.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. It has been said here, Mr. Speaker, by the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], who has made a profound study of this subject, that we have but a limited sovereignty in the Canal Zone. I want to say to him that what our sovereignty is, entire or limited, it is a sovereignty for us to exercise our rights. [Applause.] There may be a limited restriction, just the same as there would be a covenant when a man would take a deed for a house; but who will gainsay the proposition that when he enters that house he is the supreme master in the house in which he lives? And so I take it that in the Canal Zone, ceded to us by the Republic of Panama, we are sovereign masters, there to do as we wish, there to do as we please, there to make the regulations that we think are just and equitable. Some say we are not just and equitable, but let us remember that this coastwise traffic is an American proposition; that the coastwise traffic belongs to the United States alone. Foreign nations are prohibited from engaging in coastwise traffic, and if our ships engage in foreign traffic, then automatically these tolls apply and equality is done. Some say you are granting a subsidy. How can there be a subsidy in a commerce that is distinctly our own? There is no competition; no one is competing with America in her coastwise traffic. [Applause.]

PRINCIPLES OF INTERNATIONAL LAW.

Why, gentlemen, the granting of free tolls is simply the exercise of a sovereign right, recognized not only by international lawyers of eminence in this country, but also by lawyers of repute in Great Britain. Before we hurry on to destroy, before we hurry on to give up a substantial vested right, let us consider even some of the British authorities on international law who sustain the position of the United States in this controversy. If the Hay-Pauncefote treaty binds us, let us remember that it is a well-recognized principle of international law that if the conditions upon which a treaty is based change materially, the entire situation changes; let us remember that when the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was projected the territory through which the canal was to be built was foreign territory.

Dr. Hannis Taylor has thrown light on the question. No one doubts his claim as an authority on international law. In particular I want to call attention to these words of his, spoken in April, 1913:

The conclusion is irresistible that by the radical changes wrought in conditions existing at the time the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made, through subsequent purchase of the Canal Zone by the United States, the treaty as a whole became voidable. Or, to use the words of Prof. Oppenheim, that the vital change wrought by the subsequent purchase of the Canal Zone rendered an otherwise "unnotifiable treaty" notifiable. Under the universally accepted rule of rebus sic stantibus, so luminously expounded by the greatest of the recent English publicists, we have the right and Great Britain has the right to call a diplomatic conference in order to make such modifications in the terms of this voidable or "notifiable" treaty as either party may desire.

None of it was then the property of the United States of America; but within two short years afterwards, 1903, after Panama revolted from Colombia and established a Republic of its own, they ceded to us for a valuable consideration this Canal Zone, and it became ours, and the moment it became ours there attached to it that sovereign power which goes with ownership; and the nation that challenges our right there in effect says to us: "We want to limit your sovereignty and impose a servitude upon the territory which belongs to you."

DIPLOMATIC ADJUSTMENT AND ARBITRATION.

It is a well-established rule of international law that one sovereign can not claim a servitude on the territory of another except by compact, and "if a dispute occurs between a territorial sovereign and a foreign power as to the extent or nature of rights enjoyed by the latter within the territory of the former, the presumption is against the foreign state, and upon it the burden lies of proving its claim beyond doubt or question." And now, without even inviting diplomatic adjustment, without even the thought or suggestion of arbitration, we are hastening, without any definite known reason, to abandon our side of the controversy, which has had the profound indorsement of two ex-Presidents, Taft and Roosevelt, and the approval of three great political parties.

Some there are who would read treaties of great magnitude in a minute and digest them in a moment. Our ships pass free now from coast to coast, and if a canal had been built across the continent from New Orleans to San Francisco, who would look with toleration upon the claim of any foreign nation to impose tolls upon our ships going through such a canal? The Nation would be up in arms against such a proposition. The canal passes through the Canal Zone, ceded to us by the Republic of Panama. It is ours, where we enjoy the right of sovereignty.

As an American citizen, I protest against any nation dictating to us what we shall do with purely a domestic question. [Applause.] And I venture this prophecy, that this position will be unquestionably sustained by the American people at the polls. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE].

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, there is a widespread and general belief that in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty now in force the United States and Great Britain entered into an agreement that the Panama Canal should be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations on terms of entire equality. Newspapers and weekly and monthly magazines of high character and wide influence have so quoted the treaty. The latest example which has come to my notice is an article in a great national weekly for March 21, 1914, which pronounces severe judgment against any man who can read that clause of the treaty, and with it read the clause in the act of August 24, 1912, which it is now proposed to repeal, and still refuse to admit that the law is a violation of the treaty.

I wish to say at once that I do not believe the editor of that paper intended to misrepresent the treaty. He probably had before his eyes a passage which I intend to quote from a speech delivered in New York by the Hon. Joseph H. Choate more than a year ago and lately reprinted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in which the treaty is quoted with the same inaccuracy. The orator referred then to Senator ROOT'S proposal to strike out of the Panama Canal bill a provision which Mr. Choate said—is believed by him and by us and by almost the unanimous voice of the American press, I think, to be in conflict with the treaty. Why, the merest schoolboy can pass upon the question.

I am going to read you the two clauses, and I would like to challenge any Member to show how they can possibly be reconciled:

"The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise."

That is what the treaty says. In the canal bill the clause covered by Mr. ROOT's motion to strike out is this:

"No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States."

Can you put those two things together and reconcile them in any possible way?

The language I have just quoted is attributed to the Hon. Joseph H. Choate, and is found in the report of his speech before the chamber of commerce of the city of New York, February 13, 1913. More than a year later it was reprinted on page 4155 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 24, 1914. The assertion of the schoolboy's competency to pass on the question and the challenge to show how the two clauses could be reconciled are still there; and, astounding as it may be, the inaccurate citation of the treaty is not corrected. A newspaper or magazine writer would doubtless feel perfectly safe in following Mr. Choate's citation of this rule. Mr. Choate was the American ambassador to Great Britain when the treaty was negotiated and was, of course, at that time very familiar with every phrase in it. No one would charge Mr. Choate with intentional inaccuracy in quoting this treaty, especially when the very question under consideration depended upon the correct interpretation of the clause quoted.

Nevertheless, the language which this report of Mr. Choate's speech attributes to him has had wide circulation and has influenced many intelligent men. It leaves out precisely the phrase on which hangs an important part of the argument for the other side.

The treaty does not say:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations on terms of entire equality—

It does say:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality—

It is not all nations, but "all nations observing these rules," that are to have the use of the canal on terms of entire equality.

Is our Nation one of those expected to observe these rules? In preparing an answer to this question, let us first review some of the rules.

Rule 1 contains, together with other things, the language already quoted. Rule 3 provides that the warships of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take in stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary, and shall pass through the canal with the least possible delay. Rule 4 provides that no belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit. Rule 5 provides that vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain within 3 marine miles of either end of the canal more than 24 hours at any one time except in case of distress.

Did the people of the United States ever understand that we were to be included among the "nations observing these rules"? If ever the United States should become a belligerent, which God forbid, are our warships to be bound by these restrictions? Are we to be bound not to coal our battleships in the canal or in any of its ports? Is another Oregon to seek for coal in the ports of a friendly nation while the coaling stations in the canal are closed against her? Are we to be bound not to embark or disembark troops in the Canal Zone where even now we are building barracks to receive troops? Are our warships to be forbidden to remain longer than 24 hours within 3 miles of either end of the canal in support of the fortifications we are building there?

In time of war between the United States and any foreign nation, if such a time should ever come, I do not believe that we are then to be bound by these restrictions. I do not believe that it was so intended by the statesmen, whether American or British, who negotiated the treaty nor by the Senate which ratified it.

If we are not so bound, then how can it be thought that we are included among the "all nations observing these rules" whose "vessels of commerce and of war" are to use the canal on terms of entire equality?

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] read an extract from a document known as the "Hay memorandum," which was sent to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations by Secretary Hay with the existing treaty when it was submitted for ratification. In that memorandum the opinion was expressed that war between the two contracting powers, or between the United States and any other power, would have the ordinary effect of war upon treaties when not specially otherwise provided, and would remit both parties to their natural right of self-defense, and give to the United States the clear right to close the canal against the other belligerent, and to protect it and defend itself by whatever means might be necessary. If that is the case, all those rules of article 3 that provide what may or may not be done by belligerents in the canal were not intended to apply to the United States [applause], and we are not one of the "all nations observing these rules." When can the warships of the United States be called belligerent? Why, of course, only when we are at war. We can not observe these rules while we are at peace, because they do not then apply to us. We do not intend to observe them when we go to war. Are we one of the "all nations observing these rules"? [Applause.]

There has been, and there is likely to be, some confusion in discussing the various Hay-Pauncefote treaties. The first Hay-Pauncefote treaty was signed on February 5, 1900, was sent to the Senate for ratification, and ratified there, with certain amendments, on December 20, having been before the Senate a little more than 10 months. The first Hay-Pauncefote treaty was the one that was amended by adding to it the Davis amendment. It was the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty to which the Bard amendment was offered, not the existing treaty which was signed in 1901 and ratified in 1902; and it seems to me, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, that all discussions as to the meaning of the treaty of 1900 are to be taken with a great deal of allowance when we assume to apply them to the treaty of 1901. When the Senate ratified the treaty of 1900, if the action can be called ratification, it was ratified with three amendments, which made it necessary to send that treaty back to Great Britain. It went back, and Lord Lansdowne replied with a letter, of February 22, 1901, declining to accept it as modified by the Senate amendments. Then Mr. Hay began the draft of a new treaty, and that new treaty differed from the treaty of 1900 in many and remarkable respects. So radical are the changes made by the new contract that the whole project is put upon a new basis. No previous declaration of policy can be read into the new treaty unless plainly expressed there.

In the first place, the treaty of 1900 differed from the treaty of 1901 in this respect, namely, article 3 then began with the statement that the "two contracting powers adopt the following rules." The present treaty begins with the statement "The United States adopts the following rules." [Applause.] The old Hay-Pauncefote treaty had in the first rule this clause: "That the canal shall be free and open 'in time of war as in time of peace' to vessels of commerce and of war of all nations." The new treaty left out the promise that the canal should be open "in time of war as in time of peace." And instead of opening the canal to the ships of all nations, the new treaty opened it only to the ships of the "nations observing these rules."

Now, what is the history of that particular clause? It is this: In the old Hay-Pauncefote treaty there was no provision that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty should be superseded. It was to be still in force, with only such slight modifications as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty might make. The new treaty, which was finally adopted, contained as its first article a provision that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was superseded. That released the United States from the agreement in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that we would never acquire territory in Central America, and therefore left us free to acquire the strip of land on which the canal was to be constructed. We likewise released Great Britain from whatever limitation the Clayton-Bulwer treaty had imposed upon her rights in Central America. The new treaty, as I have said, provided that the United States alone should adopt the rules which are the basis for neutralization and which are adopted for no other purpose. And the contention of Great Britain then was that in agreeing to the treaty on the understanding that the United States was to adopt certain rules as the basis of neutralization for the canal, Great Britain would actually assume the obligation herself of observing these rules, while the other nations would have no such obligation.

This was considered a very important matter. The former Hay-Pauncefote treaty had an article providing that other nations of the world should be invited to become signatory powers. The United States was unwilling to ask or permit any other nation to come in and join us as all the great powers of Europe had joined together for the neutralization of the Suez Canal. Consequently this article was stricken out of the original treaty by one of the Senate amendments, and, of course, was left out of the new draft prepared by Mr. Hay. Great Britain, believing that if she should sign the treaty she would be bound by the rules in article 3, while the same rules would not be binding upon other nations, proposed to insert instead of the words "all nations" this clause:

All nations which shall agree to observe these rules.

And Mr. Hay in his memorandum says that the President could not agree to this language, because he did not wish to submit the treaty to the agreement of other parties and did not wish the other powers to have any contract right in the canal. [Applause.] And he proposed, therefore, to modify the Lansdowne amendment, which would have read "all nations which shall agree to observe these rules," and to make it read "all nations observing these rules." The proposed change was acceptable to Great Britain. Lord Lansdowne's note of October 23, 1901, said:

His Majesty's Government were prepared to accept this amendment, which seemed to us equally efficacious for the purpose which we had in view, namely, that of insuring that Great Britain should not be placed in a less advantageous position than other powers, while they stopped short of conferring upon other nations a contractual right to the use of the canal.

So the treaty was written, with the complete understanding of both parties, in such fashion that if any nation on earth will not observe, shall refuse to observe, or shall neglect to observe these rules, the canal is not open to warships or ships of commerce of that nation. [Applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Including Great Britain.

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes; of course, including Great Britain.

Our rights come from the fact that we have constructed the canal. The second article of the treaty provides that the United States may construct the canal at its own cost. I believe that no nation has undertaken to challenge our right under that clause of the treaty. [Laughter.] And it further provides that, subject to the provisions of this treaty, we are to have all the rights incident to the construction of the canal as well as the exclusive right to provide for its regulation and management.

Now, under that exclusive right to provide for its regulation we adopt the regulations that are contained in article 3. Our rights being recognized in article 2, we adopt the rules in article 3 as the terms on which we admit other nations to the use of the canal. We have the right to use it because we constructed it and paid for it. [Applause.] We announce the terms on which other nations may use it. If they refuse these terms, we may refuse them the use of the canal; but the terms on which the owner permits others to use the canal he himself is not bound to observe. [Applause.]

Much light may be thrown on the subject by comparing the old and rejected form of this clause with the form which was finally accepted and is now in force. The italics in each case indicate phrases not to be found in the other form:

FIRST FORM (WHICH NEVER WENT INTO EFFECT).

The high contracting parties, desiring to preserve and maintain the "general principle" of the neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention, adopt, as the basis of such neutralization, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention between Great Britain and certain other powers, signed at Constantinople, October 29, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Maritime Canal, that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise.

FINAL FORM (AS NOW IN FORCE).

The United States adopts as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules, substantially as embodied in the Convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

In another particular the British Government perceived a very great and important difference between the new draft submitted by Mr. Hay and the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The new draft provided that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty should be superseded.

Lord Lansdowne's memorandum of August 3, 1901, mentions this provision and calls attention to one of the consequences:

The draft contains no stipulation against the acquisition of sovereignty over the Isthmus or over the strip of territory through which the canal is intended to pass. There was no stipulation of this kind in the (first) Hay-Pauncefote convention; but, by the surviving portion of article 1 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention, the two Governments agreed that neither would ever occupy or fortify or colonize or assume or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America, nor attain any of the foregoing objects by protection offered to, or alliance with, any State or people of Central America.

It is apparent, therefore, that Lord Lansdowne foresaw that the United States would probably acquire sovereignty over the Isthmus or over the strip of territory through which the canal was intended to pass. He therefore proposed an additional article in the following terms, on the acceptance of which, he said, Great Britain would probably withdraw its objections to the formal abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer convention:

In view of the permanent character of this treaty, whereby the general principle established by article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention is reaffirmed, the high contracting parties hereby declare and agree that the rules laid down in the last preceding article shall, so far as they may be applicable, govern all interoceanic communications across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and that no change of territorial sovereignty or other change of circumstances shall effect such general principle or the obligations of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

We are told in the Hay memorandum that the President regarded the proposed article as too far-reaching for the purpose in view and as converting the vague and indefinite provisions of the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty into a very definite and certain present treaty, and as perpetuating in a more definite form the embarrassing effects of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, of which the United States hoped to be relieved altogether. We are told also that these views were communicated to the British Government, and as a substitute for the article proposed by Lord Lansdowne the following was proposed by the United States:

It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the beforementioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligations of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

The Hay memorandum then offers the following comment:

Upon a full exchange of views this article proposed by the United States was accepted by Great Britain and becomes article 4 of the treaty now submitted. It is thought to do entire justice to the reasonable demands of Great Britain in preserving the general principle of neutralization and at the same time to relieve the United States of the vague, indefinite, and embarrassing obligations imposed by the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

A few minor changes were suggested and adopted and the new treaty was signed and submitted to the proper authorities for ratification.

The new treaty was vastly different from any that had been submitted before. It abrogated and superseded the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; the rules for neutralization were adopted by the United States alone; the words "in time of war as in time of peace" were omitted from clause 1 of article 3, making the language of the Davis amendment unnecessary; there was no provision for other powers to adhere to the treaty, and the clause which prohibited the fortification of the canal was omitted.

In view of all these changes, and taking into consideration their total effect, Mr. Hay was able to say in the memorandum which he sent to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations:

The whole theory of the treaty is that the canal is to be an entirely American canal. The enormous cost of constructing it is to be borne by the United States alone. When constructed it is to be exclusively the property of the United States, and is to be managed, controlled, and defended by it.

A similar argument to that which I am attempting to set forth is stated briefly in a paper prepared by Mr. Richard Olney, formerly Secretary of State, and read before the American Society of International Law, April 25, 1913. After quoting the clause which promises that the canal shall be open on equal terms to the vessels of all nations observing these rules, Mr. Olney says:

The words under construction are, in substance, the first of a set of six rules adopted by the United States as the basis of the neutralization of the canal.

But the other five certainly apply only to parties other than the United States, so that there is the strongest reason for holding that the first of them is to be given a like application.

And, if the British construction be correct, instead of liberating the United States from all foreign control of the canal and from all duties to foreign powers in respect of its use—except not to discriminate between them—the Hay-Pauncefote treaty compels the United States to reverse its established policy and to devise a plan for subsidizing its own vessels in order that they may have such free and other use of the canal as the United States may decide to be demanded by United States interests.

Mr. Chairman, less than two years ago the House of Representatives in good faith passed the clause exempting vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States from the payment of tolls. In good faith the Senate agreed to it. In good faith the President of the United States signed it.

Now another President has come before us, saying that in his judgment, very fully considered and maturely formed, that exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy, and is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal.

Have not other men maturely considered it? It may be a mistaken economic policy. Many of us would like to have an opportunity to take up that question at a time when it could be considered on its merits. Two years ago this was a question of domestic economic policy. Now the domestic economic policy is insignificant. It is a question of the future foreign policy of the United States, not of the present foreign policy. [Applause.]

The President has asked us to grant his request in support of the foreign policy of the administration. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the foreign policy of the administration is [applause], and therefore I do not know whether I want to support it or not. [Laughter.] I can not vote for this bill on that appeal, for I see the future foreign policy of the United States for generations to come hampered and shackled and bound. There is only one way by which I can register my conviction that we should remain free and that this law is not a violation of the treaty, and that is to vote "no" on this bill. [Applause.]

If I had a chance, if you had not gagged me with a rule, I would make a proposal. I am not talking now about talk. You have given 20 hours for talk. We may unpack our hearts with words, but we may make no amendment; we may offer no substitute.

If you had not made it impossible, I would propose to postpone the operation of this exemption clause for two years, or three, and in the meantime submit the interpretation of this treaty to arbitration. [Applause.] Men tell us we can not get an impartial jury. Have we forgotten the Geneva arbitration of the Alabama claims, when Charles Francis Adams, the representative of the United States, time after time, on many of the counts that came before the arbitrators, voted against the interests of the United States, and did it righteously? Have we forgotten that Sir Alexander Cockburn, the representative of Great Britain, voted against the British contentions in the most important case, the cruiser Alabama herself; that Charles Francis Adams never voted alone on the question of England's responsibility for any of the nine Confederate cruisers included in the Alabama claims, and that the British representative never voted alone but once? In most of the items in dispute it did not take the neutral members of the board of arbitration to settle the question. Six of the nine cases submitted were decided by the unanimous vote of the tribunal; and that was at a time when feeling ran high and there was danger of war.

There is no danger of war now. There is no ill will on the part of the United States toward Great Britain, and I believe there is no ill will in Great Britain toward the United States. I am confident that we could find an impartial jury. But you will not allow me even to propose it. Therefore I must vote "no" on the only thing that you will allow me to vote on. [Prolonged applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] is recognized.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, it is to be hoped that we understand and appreciate the tremendous significance of the question we are now to determine. Its importance is not to be measured by considerations of policy, nor by the amount of tolls which may be collected or remitted. The issue has gone far beyond those matters. There are several factors in issue greater and of more vital importance. There is involved the question of our legislative independence; whether we should surrender our judgment, "right or wrong," to the Executive; whether we should reverse our deliberate determination of a great question to the mere wish and request of the President, not upon reasons stated, the weight and worth of which we could determine upon consideration, but for undisclosed reasons based upon unknown grounds the value and validity of which we can not judge.

The question is also to be considered whether having determined the matter in a manner we thought justifiable and right, and having submitted that action to a referendum of the American electorate, and that action and determination having been sustained and confirmed by the vote of the people—whether in view of such fact we, as the representatives of that people, can now be justified in reversing such action at the demand of a foreign power.

Greater than these is the question whether we can or should yield the right to control our domestic commerce in any particular or to any extent to a foreign power.

Still greater than this is the question whether we should surrender the control in any degree to a foreign power or powers of a great, perhaps our greatest, single element or item of national defense.

It is but fair to say that the President has not believed these important and vital matters were involved in our action. It is inconceivable that he should deliberately propose action that would not only sacrifice our national interests, but endanger our national existence. It is probable that, thinking largely of the economic aspect of the case, and yielding lightly to the idea so strongly urged that we had no right, under the treaty, to make the exemption, and believing that to yield on what he judged was an unimportant matter would help him in carrying out his foreign policy, he has asked the Congress to yield its judgment to his.

If the Congress could yield an unimportant matter to please or help the President it would doubtless be glad to do so. But if the matter is not unimportant; if, on the contrary, it is of great, of vital import; if to yield an item would yield a principle; if to yield to the President's wish means to yield to an unwarranted foreign demand; if to surrender the tolls means to surrender the canal; if to give up our claim of control of the canal means to give up the greatest single item of our national defense; then we ought not to yield, and the President ought not to expect us to yield.

CONTROL BY TREATY OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The treaty-making power, like any other Federal power, is derived from the Constitution, and must be exercised within the limits of its authority. Whatever differences of opinion exist as to the extent of this power, all authorities agree that there are two necessary limitations—first, the treaty-making power must be limited to subjects of international relationship; and, second, it must act in consonance with and not antagonistic to the Constitution.

In the Cherokee Tobacco case (11 Wall., 616) the opinion declares:

> It need hardly be said that a treaty can not change the Constitution or be held valid if it be in violation of that instrument. This results from the nature and fundamental principles of our Government.

Mr. Calhoun, writing of the limits of the treaty-making power, says:

> It can enter into no stipulation calculated to change the character of the Government, or to do that which can only be done by the Constitution-making power, or which is inconsistent with the nature and structure of the Government. (1 Works, 203.)

Dr. Willoughby, in his late work on constitutional law, says:

> The treaty-making power may not be used to secure a regulation or control of a matter not properly and fairly a matter of international concern. It can not be employed with reference to a matter not legitimately a subject for international agreement any more than can the States, under the claim of an exercise of their police powers, regulate a matter not fairly comprehended within the field of police regulation.

And he adds:

> There are matters of domestic national law with which foreign power has no concern.

It is claimed that the treaty made with Great Britain prohibits our right to control our coastwise or domestic commerce.

It should be thoroughly understood that our coastwise trade is commerce between the States. It is interstate commerce. To transport goods from New York to New Orleans is as much interstate commerce when it is carried by boat as when it is carried by rail. And when goods are carried by boat from New Orleans through the canal to San Francisco or Seattle it will be as clearly interstate commerce as it would be if the goods were sent by rail.

The Constitution lodges the power to regulate interstate commerce in Congress. The Supreme Court has over and over again held that such power was exclusively lodged in Congress. The President has no such power; neither has the Senate; neither have both combined. To regulate and control our interstate commerce is not within the treaty-making power, and any attempt to exercise such power by the President and the Senate is a clear usurpation of authority, without warrant under the Constitution.

The canal is now located on our own soil which we have bought and paid for, over which we hold undisputed control, where no other law governs but American law, and over which no flag floats but the American flag. It is as American as the District of Columbia, and is governed in the same way—directly by the Congress of the United States. It is domestic territory in every sense of the word. We built a canal there just as we are to build a railroad in Alaska. We have the same right to control the canal as we will have to control our railroad in Alaska.

The question of the control of the canal, so far as our interstate commerce is concerned, is as purely domestic, and the jurisdiction of Congress as clearly exclusive, as it is over the St. Marys Canal or the Ohio River.

To hold, then, that a treaty made with a foreign power can enter the field of our local law, can infringe upon the constitutional powers of Congress, can take away from Congress an exclusive authority granted to it by the fundamental law, is not justified. The President asks us to give up not only tolls but our constitutional prerogative to control our interstate trade. He asks us to agree to the proposition that a foreign Government can share in the power of Congress to regulate our domestic commerce.

No treaty does or can give a foreign Government partnership with Congress in the exercise of its constitutional powers. It is needless to say the Hay-Pauncefote treaty did not do so, but it is unfortunately true that the interpretation which is now sought to be placed upon it will make it so.

THE HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty was proclaimed by President Roosevelt February 22, 1902.

In his message submitting the completed treaty to the Senate for ratification the President said:

In this treaty the old Clayton-Bulwer treaty, so long recognized as inadequate to supply the base for the construction and maintenance of a necessarily American ship canal, is abrogated. It specifically provides that the United States alone shall do the work of building and assume the responsibility of safeguarding its neutral use by all nations on terms of equality without the guaranty or interference of any outside nation from any quarter.

This was the declaration of an American President that the object and purpose of the new treaty was to build an "American ship canal." In his statement President Roosevelt declares that the "old Clayton-Bulwer treaty, so long recognized as inadequate, * * * is abrogated."

Yet it is a singular and significant fact that no argument is made in support of the violation of the treaty that is not based on the Clayton-Bulwer and not on the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. At the very commencement of Earl Grey's elaborate statement of the British contention he says:

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty does not stand alone; it was the corollary of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850.

And he proceeds to base his argument on what Great Britain's claims were under the former treaty. The English secretary's use of the word "corollary" is ingenious, but not convincing. If the new treaty superseded the old, it is difficult to see how the new was a "corollary" of the old. Great Britain was willing that the United States should build the canal at its own expense, provided that Great Britain was relieved of all responsibility. By the terms of the old treaty Great Britain, jointly with the United States, undertook to protect the canal that should be built and to guarantee its neutrality. Under the new treaty she absolved herself of those and all other obligations and imposed them on the United States. This country agreed to accept the obligations, but insisted they should not be those of the old treaty but those of the new. Every duty and obligation imposed by the new treaty is expressed in it and can not be enlarged to include obligations undertaken in a former treaty which it expressly and emphatically superseded.

Mr. Choate is reported as saying that he thinks if Mr. Hay and Lord Pauncefote were alive they would join in saying that to exempt our coastwise trade was a violation of the treaty which they negotiated. I do not agree with him as to what Mr. Hay would say. Mr. Hay first submitted a treaty which the Senate rejected on these grounds: First, that there must be in explicit terms an express abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; second, that the rules of neutrality adopted should not deprive the United States of the right to fortify and defend the canal; third, that the other powers should not have the right to interfere in the management of the canal. A second treaty was negotiated and presented for ratification, which contained all these desired changes. It is the present treaty. Of it Mr. Hay, in submitting it to the Senate, said:

In the new draft of treaty the provision superseding the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as a whole * * * was made the subject of an independent article and presented as the first article of the treaty.

Regarding our right to defend, he said:

The whole theory of the treaty is that the canal is to be an entirely American canal. The enormous cost of constructing it is to be borne by the United States alone. When constructed it is exclusively the property of the United States and is to be managed and controlled and defended by it.

Regarding the interference of other nations in the management of the canal he said:

The United States alone, as the sole owner of the canal, as a purely American enterprise, adopts and prescribes the rules by which the use of the canal shall be regulated, and assumes the entire responsibility and burden of enforcing without the assistance of Great Britain or of any other nation its absolute neutrality.

TREATY INTERPRETATION.

In the Hay-Pauncefote treaty it is not proposed to build a canal at Panama. The word "Panama" does not appear in the treaty. The treaty says:

By whatsoever route may be considered expedient.

The route then considered was the Nicaragua route. There was no possibility of our securing from Nicaragua and Costa Rica a cession of territory on which to build the canal. All we could hope for was a right to build a canal through foreign territory.

At the time when the new treaty was negotiated it was not even determined that the United States would build a canal. The new treaty was to "remove an objection" to the construction of a canal "under the auspices of the Government of the United States." It was generally supposed at that time that a private syndicate would build it under some sort of a guaranty by the United States. Then the Panama chance offered, which President Roosevelt "took."

But conditions were entirely changed. It was not a Nicaragua but a Panama canal. It was not to be built under American "auspices," but by the United States itself. It was not to be through foreign territory, but on our own soil.

THE TERMS OF THE TREATY.

The difference between the two treaties is entirely ignored by the critics of the United States. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was an agreement that neither Great Britain nor the United States should build the canal, although both should protect it, and neither should obtain any advantages in its use. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty was an agreement that the United States should build the canal and allow all other nations which should comply with the rules which are prescribed to use it on terms of equality.

A large part of the controversy arises about the meaning of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The first provision of this article is as follows:

That the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality.

The first contention arises over whether the provision was intended to apply to the United States as included in the term "all nations."

In determining this we should first consider the situation. The treaty was being negotiated by Great Britain, but as it repeatedly claimed not for itself alone, but for all other nations as well. In other words, this was a treaty, the parties to which were the United States on one side and "all nations" on the other. Under a previous treaty Great Britan and the United States agreed that neither would build or obtain exclusive control of any isthmian canal; that they would jointly protect any canal that should be built, guarantee its neutrality, just and equitable rates, and equality of treatment to all.

Nothing was done under this treaty, and in 1902 a new treaty was made, by which the United States undertook to build the canal, to protect and maintain it, and to guarantee neutrality, equality of treatment, and just and equitable charges to all nations. Which party undertook the enterprise and guaranteed equality of treatment and just and equitable charges? The United States. What was the other party, that was to receive equality of treatment and just and equitable charges? All other nations. There is no other logical or sensible interpretation to be given to the language used. It is absurd to claim that the United States must be regarded on both sides of the contract. It alone made the investment, assumed the management, undertook the protection, and in doing so agreed to allow the free use of the canal to all other nations upon terms of equality and upon conditions and charges that should be just and reasonable.

It should be observed that the phrase "all nations" is qualified by the phrase "observing these rules." What rules? Why, the rules which "the United States adopts" for the government of the canal. That is to say, the Government of the United States agrees to impose these rules, which are specified, and agrees that any and "all nations observing these rules" shall be entitled to use the canal on terms of equality, and shall be charged therefor only "just and equitable tolls." This is a pledge and a guaranty to all other nations, and it is unreasonable to claim that the United States was providing and guaranteeing these things to itself.

The next clause on which argument is made is as follows:

So that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

This provision would prevent the United States from discriminating against any nation willing to observe the rules which the United States prescribes, and guarantees that all conditions imposed and charges fixed shall be just and reasonable. It will prevent the United States from imposing more tolls or greater exactions on one nation than another. That is the meaning and all the meaning there is in it. To construe it into denying that the United States might use the canal as it chose is to torture the language into something never intended and utterly foreign.

ARTICLE 3.

One wonders why gentlemen always commence their discussion of the canal with article 3 of the treaty. Why is article 1, which provides in express terms that the new treaty "shall supersede" the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, not quoted and discussed? And why is article 2, which provides that the United States shall have "the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal," not referred to? And why is that part of article 3 which provides that only those "nations observing these rules"—rules which the United States adopts for the regulation and management of the canal—shall have the privilege of using the canal not also discussed?

It ought to be clear that, when the United States promises to allow the use of its canal by the observance of its rules for such use, and promises equality of treatment in such use to all nations who so obey its rules, it is not making rules for its own use of the canal.

"THESE RULES."

The language of the treaty is that the United States guarantees to all nations the free use of the canal if they will observe "these rules" which the United States prescribes. "These rules," then, are the conditions the observance of which entitles other nations to the use of the canal. It is absurd to claim that when we were making rules by which we were to allow the use of the canal to other nations we should have included in a treaty the terms by which a part of our own domestic traffic should use our own canal. Congress is given power to regulate our commerce, not the President by treaties with foreign countries.

The United States does not use its own canal by virtue of any rules. It uses it because it built it, paid for it, and owns it.

It has bound itself not to deny its use to any other nation, not to give any such nation an advantage over any other, but it may use the canal itself as it chooses.

NEUTRALIZATION.

A labored argument is made upon the ground that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty provides that "the general principles of neutralization" established in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is to govern the later treaty. From this the deduction is drawn that the "general principle of neutralization" carries with it all the obligations of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, including tolls and charges. A mere statement of this proposition ought to make clear its weakness. If the adoption of the general principle of neutralization carried with it all the obligations of the old treaty, there was no necessity for making the new, and the statement of the new treaty that it "shall supersede" the old is meaningless.

An argument is made on behalf of Great Britain based on the assumption that the term "general principle of neutralization" includes within its meaning traffic conditions. This is not justified. No such meaning ever has been or can now be given the word "neutralization." Its meaning in international law is simply immunity from attack. Referring to neutral territory, we mean that which is free from attack. Thus Kent in his Commentaries said:

> It is not lawful to make neutral territory the scene of hostility or to attack an enemy while within it.

Alexander Hamilton, in the Federalist, said:

> The rights of neutrality will only be respected when they are defended by an adequate power. A nation, despicable by its weakness, forfeits even the privilege of being neutral.

We undertook to make the canal as Kent understood it—that is, free from hostility and to prevent one hostile nation from attacking another within its zone. It was supposed that we were a Nation of adequate power so that we could compel respect, as Hamilton suggested, and not one of such despicable weakness as to be unable or unwilling to preserve and protect our rights.

ALL NATIONS.

The case of the opposition, in large part, rests upon two words in section 1, article 3, of the treaty. Those words are "all nations." It is confidently demanded, "Do not these words mean what they say—all nations? Does not that clearly include the United States?"

It ought to be clear that when the parties to a transaction consist on the one side of an individual nation which is binding itself to grant certain privileges to the other side, which other side consists of "all nations," which shall observe certain rules which the first party shall prescribe, that the words "all nations" means not itself, but all the other nations. Again, it is not alone "all nations," but "all nations observing these rules." It is not probable that the United States was making rules for itself and then pledging itself to be governed by its own rules. The fair, the reasonable, the apparent meaning of the section is that the United States will make and keep the canal open to all the nations which would observe the rules which it prescribed, and treat them all alike, and that whatever conditions or charges were imposed for its use should be just and equitable. Any other interpretation is forced, fanciful, and unreasonable. Any other meaning would be out of harmony with the other provisions of the treaty and not consonant with the conditions and circumstances under which it was made.

It is a very strong circumstance as indicative that this must be the true construction that the provisions of the act apply to vessels of war as well as vessels of commerce. The language is "vessels of commerce and of war." That is, vessels of war "of all nations" should be treated on terms of equality, and so forth. If vessels of commerce of all nations includes vessels of commerce of the United States, then vessels of war of all nations includes vessels of war of the United States. If other nations should pay tolls on their war vessels, so should the United States. That this was not intended must be apparent.

If the British contention is upheld, the United States could not use its own Navy in its own defense. It could not "revictual nor take any stores"; it could not remain in the Canal Zone longer than necessary to get through; it could not "disembark troops, munitions of war, or war-like material" in the Canal Zone; it could not remain in the waters adjacent to the canal "longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible." If this interpretation is to be given the treaty, then we can not call the canal an American canal, for it is not.

It should be thoroughly understood that we can not yield to the interpretation by which the United States is included in the phrase "all nations" on the tolls question and not yield on all others that may be claimed. If we are within its meaning for one purpose we are within its meaning for all purposes. That means nothing less than an absolute surrender of an American canal. That will make it, what the committee calls it, an "international waterway," with regard to the control of which we shall have no more power than any other nation.

We have built the canal not primarily as a commercial investment. We built it as a protection to the life of the Nation. We built it to double the strength of our Navy; we built it to guard our coasts from invasion by a foreign foe. But if "all nations" are to have the same rights we have, then our contemplated advantage is gone. Our precaution, our protection, our defense is futile and vain. So that, yielding on tolls—which, as compared with this consideration, is as nothing—we yield that which might save the Nation's life. This is the tremendous issue involved.

EQUALITY.

Our friends contend that we must treat all equally by charging our own vessels tolls. But Spain has already agreed to repay her shipping the tolls they pay. Great Britain will probably do the same, and so will France, Germany, and other nations. But we may not do this, it is claimed, directly or indirectly. Our shipping is placed not on an equality, but in a position of inferiority.

We have prohibited our railroad-owned vessels the use of the canal. But foreign vessels owned by railroads are not thus prohibited its use. Here again we are to be placed at a disadvantage if tolls are imposed on our own vessels.

Again, not only must charges be the same, but conditions must be the same. If we can not grant our ships any reduction of tolls, we can not grant our ships, either of war or commerce, any privileges of docking, refitting, supplying coal or stores, repairing, or any other benefit which we will not be compelled to also grant to the ships of "all nations."

Suppose the United States at war with Japan. England is its ally. We send the Atlantic fleet through the canal to attack Japan. Great Britain sends its fleet across the Atlantic to help its ally. Shall be allow its fleet to use the canal to attack ours? And would we be compelled to furnish this fleet the same ammunition, supplies, and coal we furnished our own fleet?

All the provisions regarding blockading the canal and its use by vessels of war are consistent when applied to all other nations than the United States, but they are ridiculous when applied to the United States.

What is meant by equality of treatment? Any court would hold that it meant equality of treatment where conditions were equal. To the fullest extent, in the utmost particular that is what we have done. To all vessels engaged in the foreign trade, including our own vessels engaged in that trade, we charge the same tolls. Every American ship which carries a cargo from any American port to any foreign port, or from a foreign port to any American port, must pay just exactly the same tolls and charges that are required of foreign vessels.

But with regard to our domestic commerce between American ports the conditions are not equal, for into that commerce no foreign ship is allowed to enter on any terms. From the first we have refused to allow a foreign ship to enter the coastwise trade.

There has been no better statement of what is meant by equality of treatment than that made by President Taft. In his memorandum to accompany the Panama Canal act, August 24, 1912, he said:

> The article is a declaration of policy by the United States that the canal shall be neutral; that the attitude of this Government toward the commerce of the world is that all nations will be treated alike and no discriminations made by the United States against any one of them observing the rules adopted by the United States. * * * The privilege to all nations to whom we extended the use upon the observance of these conditions were to be equal to that extended to any of those which observed the conditions. In other words, it was a favored-nation treatment the measure of which in the absence of express stipulation to that effect is not what the country gives to its own nationals, but the treatment it extends to other nations.

THE COASTWISE TRADE.

After the passage of the canal act in the House and while it was pending in the Senate Great Britain filed its first formal protest. It objected to any exemption of American ships engaged in foreign trade from the payment of tolls, either by direct exemption or by refunding them to the vessel by the Government. Referring to the coastwise exemption, this was the British claim:

> As to the proposal that exemption shall be given to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, a more difficult question arises. If the trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic, which is reserved for United States vessels, would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken. But it appears to my Government that it would be impossible to frame regulations which would prevent the exemption from resulting, in fact, in a preference to United States shipping and consequently in an infraction of the treaty.

It will be noticed that there is here a clear admission that no objection could be taken to our exempting our "bona fide coastwise traffic." But it appears to Great Britain that our Government will not prevent our vessels engaged in foreign traffic to go through the canal as coastwise trade. In other words, the United States will allow its vessels engaged in foreign trade and which are required by our law to pay tolls to escape such payment and go through as coastwise or exempted traffic. The charge that the United States will wink at violations of the law, will deliberately cheat foreign nations by allowing their American competitors to evade the law, is certainly a remarkable one. It is insulting and should be resented. It should be answered with a curt refusal to consider a claim based upon such a foundation rather than by a cringing compliance, which amounts to an admission that such was the intention of the United States.

Unless the plain intendment of the treaty would include our coastwise vessels, then it can not be argued that it should apply. The language of the treaty is, "The canal shall be free and open to all vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules." It is urged this includes our coastwise vessels. The United States and most other nations allow no foreign ships to enter their coastwise trade. There can be no competition there. There can be no detriment from exemption nor benefit from inclusion.

Under the general terms of a treaty between nations it is the universal practice to interpret them as not applying to coastwise trade, which it is understood is a domestic matter governed by local law. In the treaty of 1815, between Great Britain and the United States, it was provided that vessels of either in the ports of the other should pay no "higher or other duties or charges" than were imposed on vessels of the nation in which the port was situated. That treaty is still in effect; yet an American vessel entering the port of Bristol, for instance, coming from an American port, pays 56 cents per ton port charges, while English vessels pay only 20 cents. The same policy is pursued in the United States. Foreign vessels pay 12 cents port charges, while American vessels pay nothing. Pilotage exemptions are likewise made to our domestic trade.

These latter exemptions were challenged in our courts in 1904, and the question as to whether the general terms of the treaty applied to coastwise vessels was finally passed on by the Supreme Court of the United States. The case is an important one, and ought to be determinative of the matter at issue. It is known as the Olsen against Smith case, and is reported in the One hundred and ninety-fifth United States Supreme Court Reports, page 344.

OLSEN AGAINST SMITH.

The treaty of 1815 contained a provision that—

> No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States, nor in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

Nothing was stated in connection with this provision as to whether it applied only to vessels engaged in the foreign trade or included also vessels engaged in the coastwise or domestic trade.

The action was brought by certain licensed pilots of Galveston, Tex., against certain unlicensed pilots for piloting a British vessel coming from a foreign port. The State law and the United States law exempted coastwise steam vessels from pilotage charges, but did not exempt vessels of the United States or foreign vessels engaged in the foreign trade from such charges. It was contended that because vessels of the United States engaged in the coastwise trade were exempted from pilotage charges, while British vessels were compelled to pay such charges, that there was a violation of the treaty with Great Britain which expressly provided that "no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States."

In this case a higher charge was imposed on British vessels in a port of the United States than was imposed on vessels of the United States engaged in coastwise trade in the same port. If the general language of the treaty included our coastwise vessels there was an undoubted violation of the treaty. Our Supreme Court held that they were not so included. The language is unequivocal and emphatic. Replying to that contention the Supreme Court said:

> Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage, resulting from the law of the United States, nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law, concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in the foreign trade and in favor of vessels of the United States in such trade.

Referring to the logic of the contention, the court said:

> In substance the proposition but asserts that because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations, therefore there is no power to subject vessels in the foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even although such regulations apply without discrimination to all vessels engaged in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign.

And that is exactly the logic, or rather want of logic, of the opposition's contention. They contend that because we have exempted our domestic commerce from tolls, although we charge our own vessels engaged in the foreign trade exactly the same as we charge foreign vessels, and although by law all foreign vessels are excluded entirely from our coastwise trade, nevertheless such exemption constitutes a violation of the treaty.

Our friends are fond of quoting that part of the treaty which provides for "entire equality." There can be no equality of any kind with regard to the coastwise traffic until the British are allowed to enter it; and, under the decision of the Supreme Court, there could be no discrimination against them until, being admitted to such commerce, vessels so admitted are charged tolls while vessels of the United States are exempted. As conditions exist now, in the language of the Supreme Court, it is "no concern" of Great Britain what we do with our coastwise trade.

That decision is, or ought to be, decisive of the present contention, for the language of the treaty of 1815 is stronger against an exemption of our coastwise trade than is the language of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. No amount of elimination and substitution can avoid the plain fact that the Supreme Court squarely held that when the word "vessels" is used without qualifying words in a treaty with a foreign power it can not be made to include vessels engaged in the coastwise trade from which foreign vessels are excluded.

"JUST AND EQUITABLE."

In Earl Gray's statement he admits that the determination of what is a "just and equitable" charge is to be derived from a proportionate rate of maintaining the canal, which he states to be "interest on the capital expended in construction and the cost of operation and maintenance," and he demands "on behalf of the British shipping that all vessels passing through the canal, whatever their flag or their character, shall be taken into account in fixing the amount of the tolls.

If we had estimated the amount of shipping passing through the canal and, by excluding our coastwise trade, had placed the entire burden of interest, operation, and maintenance upon the other shipping, then, upon the basis he states, he would have a right to complain. But that was what he feared we might do. In fact, we have done nothing of the kind.

The canal will cost at least $400,000,000. The annual interest charge at 3 per cent would be $12,000,000. The annual cost of operation and maintenance, as stated in the majority report, will be $5,000,000. Total cost per year, $17,000,000. The average annual tonnage passing through the canal for the first year is estimated by the Government expert at 10,500,000 tons, and this estimate includes our coastwise trade. The tolls have already been fixed and proclaimed at $1.20 per registered ton. On the British contention we would be justified in charging, without any margin of profit or provision for a sinking fund, $1.62 per ton. We have not only been "just and equitable" in our treatment of foreign commerce using the canal, we have been generous and almost lavish. We have surrendered for the encouragement of the world's commerce 42 cents on each ton which will pass through the canal. It is estimated that British tonnage alone will be 4,000,000 tons each year. Instead of Great Britain having cause of complaint, we are voluntarily "subsidizing" her vessels to the extent of $1,680,000. To gentlemen who are so fearful of subsidies this is certainly an instance that they should bitterly condemn.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

If the contention of the other side is justified, what becomes of the Monroe doctrine? Was it the intention of John Hay to surrender that doctrine without the knowledge of the United States? Or is it contended that, while we will not allow any European nation, or would "prefer" that no European nation, should acquire control of any more land on the American continent, "all nations" are free to acquire and control all the waterways they can secure. To anyone it must appear that to acquire a joint control of the Panama Canal is of vastly more importance than to acquire and absorb a half dozen Central or South American Republics.

During the administration of a former Democratic President this Nation, under his leadership, did not even allow Great Britain to settle a boundary controversy with Venezuela, but insisted that the United States had a right to interfere at least far enough to see that Venezuela was not overreached. Now it is proposed that we give up an American interest ten thousand times greater without a contest.

THE ECONOMIC QUESTION.

I shall not attempt to discuss the economic aspects of the case at this time. Nor do I now regard that aspect of the case as controlling. I can and do understand the attitude of gentlemen who believed it economically unwise or unjust to exempt American coastwise trade from the payment of tolls. I know there are some who believe that such exemption will not benefit the Nation at large, but only or primarily benefit the shipping interests. There are some who regard the exemption as a subsidy, and they are opposed to subsidies in any form. There are some who believe we need the tolls and ought not to exempt any. There are some who believe we should charge tolls on all our improved waterways. I understand such positions and the arguments available to support them, and while I do not agree with them I respect them and admit they are worthy of serious consideration.

But they are not now involved. Those are all domestic problems, questions concerning our interstate commerce which we can take up at any time and consider and determine. But now we are to consider and determine whether we have a right to hereafter discuss and act at all. If this is not a domestic problem, if it is governed by a treaty, then hereafter our hands are tied. It is for legislative liberty we are now struggling; it is for independence from foreign domination and control we are now striving. It is to save to Congress what the Constitution gave to it, namely, the control of the domestic commerce of the Nation, that we now plead. These things preserved, we can take up those questions untrammeled and uninfluenced by any other motives than their own inherent merits.

OTHER OPINIONS.

The President says:

Whatever may be our differences of opinion concerning this much-debated measure its meaning is not debated outside the United States. Everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal.

If that be true, why is it that England alone of all the nations of the world has filed its protest? If other nations believed we had violated a treaty in the interpretation of which they had as much interest as England, why have they not joined with that country in its demand for a repeal of the exemption? It is of course true that they will be pleased to learn of a concession on the part of the United States to their advantage, and it is probably true there are some nations that will rejoice at our discomfiture and humiliation. But it is remarkable, if they are all so certain we are wronging them, that none protest save Great Britain alone.

But the assertion that the question is not debated elsewhere is far from true. Jurists everywhere have debated it. Mr. Butte, a German jurist, in an able monograph published at Heidelberg, at every point sustains the American contention. Summing up the respective claims, he says:

From the standpoint of abstract justice, the pretention of Great Britain that she should be put on the same footing as respects the use and enjoyment of the Panama Canal as the United States seems presumptuous.

Equally strong is an able article by an able English jurist, Mr. Edward S. Cox-Sinclair, in the London Law Magazine and Review. Summing up, he says:

The United States can support its action on the precise words of the material articles of the treaty; its case is strengthened by reference to the preamble and context, and its case is difficult to challenge on the grounds of natural justice.

Another English jurist, Mr. C. A. Hereshoff Bartlett, in discussing the question, says:

There is no evasion of the rule of equality where all foreign vessels are subject to the same duties and liabilities under similar circumstances.

The treaty could never have been intended to prevent the Federal Government from arranging and regulating its domestic or coastwise commerce and in the use and enjoyment of its own property as it saw fit. No such restriction could have been in view in adopting "as the basis for neutralization" a rule that the canal should be free and open to vessels of commerce and of war of all nations on terms of entire equality. It would be absurd for the United States to solemnly declare that its own vessels of war might openly and freely navigate its own landlocked waterways and enjoy the privileges that belong to the nation as a sovereign power in the use of its own territory. The use of the words "vessels of war" shows plainly that the word "vessels" as used refers only and exclusively to those of all nations other than those of the United States, and that the word "nations" was restricted to foreign nations; that is to say, nations foreign to the United States.

Count Reventlow, the noted German naval critic, says:

The canal bill interprets the Anglo-American treaty from a certain viewpoint, but is in no sense an evasion thereof. That the United States had a right to construe the treaty as Taft did can not be doubted.

Even the London Daily News admits that the United States might have an abstract right not to impose tolls on American coastwise shipping, just as Great Britain has the right to abstain from participation in the Panama Exposition, but that such actions would be mistakes on the part of both nations.

The President fears we are to invite the hostility of the world by our action. But is he justified in this? Nearly two years have passed since the canal act became a law. No nation but England has ever filed a formal protest, and England has not pressed hers. It is a singular and significant fact that every time the matter is pressed for action the incentive, the initiation, comes from this side the sea.

And of what can they complain? We have made the tolls lower than any nation demanded or even suggested or expected. We have made the conditions easy. We have not denied the free use of the canal to any nation. In short, if it were not for the unjustifiable denunciation of our act made by our own people the world would now be ringing with praises for the United States because of its generous and magnanimous treatment of the commerce of other nations.

I believe that the words of President Roosevelt a year ago were fully justified when he said:

I believe that the position of the United States is proper as regards this coastwise traffic. I think we have a right to free bona fide coastwise traffic from tolls. I think that this does not interfere with the rights of any other nation, because no ships but our own can engage in coastwise traffic, so that there is no discrimination against other ships when we relieve the coastwise traffic from tolls. I believe that the only damage that would be done is the damage to the Canadian Pacific Railway. In all history I do not believe you can find another instance when as great and expensive a work as the Panama Canal, undertaken not by a private corporation but by a nation, has been as generously put at the service of all the nations of mankind.

GIVE UP ANYWAY.

The President urges that we must give up free tolls in order to put ourselves right before other nations.

But how are we to "put ourselves right"? There is only one way and that is to demand our rights and never under any circumstances to surrender them either at the request or demand of other nations—our rights, not our claims. If we make claims which are not justified, we should abandon them whether requested to do so or not. But our rights we must maintain at any cost or else we will lose our own self-respect as well as the respect of others.

In the President's view the tolls question is of minor importance. It can amount to only a couple of millions a year. It will not hurt us to give that up. But it is singular the President thinks that is all that is involved. "Right or wrong" we should give up, he says. But that is not a justifiable position. If there is a "right or wrong," if there is a principle involved, if we believe we are right, we must not give up no matter how small the amount immediately involved. The English tax on tea was infinitesimal. It would not have harmed the colonies to have paid it. But in that insignificant tax was involved the great principle for which the colonies were struggling—that there should be no taxation without representation. And so, although they risked everything, although all the world wondered at their hardihood, they challenged the most powerful Empire on earth to a death struggle in support of what they believed right.

It may be the President sees dangers that cause him apprehension. It may be that his bungling diplomacy is causing him present embarrassment. But there is only one real danger and that is national cowardice. We can maintain our place among the nations of the world even if we do blunder. But we can not maintain our place or command respect if we endeavor to purchase approval at the price of our national honor and integrity.

In the days of the Civil War, when our very existence hung trembling in the balance, we compelled England to abandon fitting out Confederate cruisers to harry our commerce, and we compelled France to abandon its project of erecting an empire in Mexico. We did this not by bluster, but by a quiet, dignified insistence on our rights as we understood them. There is nothing so compelling of respect as a firm adherence to our own policy. There is nothing that will so quickly bring imposition as a servile surrender to secure the approval of others.

If we surrender our views of what is right and what is best in this instance to please the President, how far will we be asked to go? If we begin to yield, how far shall we be pressed? What other concession will Great Britain or some other power ask if this be granted? To yield on this will only encourage further pressure. Are we to be asked to yield to Japan and Italy on immigration; to Spain and France, irritated because of our Mexican policy; to the Netherlands because of its protest against our seamen's bill; to Germany because of the tariff; to Russia because of our denunciation of their treaty?

In our intercourse with other nations differences like these will constantly arise. Will it be a good, a wise, a safe policy to adopt—of surrender under pressure when we believe we are right?

It was President Cleveland who said, in a much more critical case than the present:

> There is no calamity a great nation can invite that equals a supine submission to wrong and injustice and the consequent loss of national self-respect and honor, beneath which are shielded and defended a people's safety and greatness.

THE MORAL VIEWPOINT.

I have suggested some of the consequences that are likely to follow an admission of the correctness of the British contention. But there is still another consequence that will inevitably follow our surrender to the President's demand. By his own statement all the world claims that by exempting our own domestic coastwise trade from tolls on our own canal we perpetrated a wrong; we consciously violated the plain terms of a solemn treaty; that deliberately and with set purpose to secure an unconscionable advantage we broke our agreement; that we were thereby guilty of a breach of faith, of common honesty, of our national honor.

To this charge we plead guilty if we yield to the President's demand. Are we willing to do this? Are we ready to confess to all the world that our action was not only mistaken but cowardly, dastardly, comtemptibly wrong? For a nation that endeavors to secure an advantage when in a position to hold its plunder and only yields when it finds it unsafe longer to keep its booty is not entitled to the decent respect of mankind.

I confess I am unable to understand the high moral quality of the President's position, so lavishly praised in the English journals.

In the first place, the President accepts the tolls exemption as the platform principle of his party, not only tacitly but by parading it and by asking the farmers to support his party and vote for him because carrying out such a policy would give them cheaper transportation rates. On that, with other pledges and promises, he succeeded in securing their support. Now, having won, he repudiates his platform, he violates his pledge to faithfully carry out its promises; he says that to grant free tolls to our domestic commerce is a mistaken policy, violates our treaty with Great Britain, is opposed by every foreign nation, and, whether right or wrong, we ought to give up to please and help him. If such action can be regarded as governed by high moral principles, we will have to revise our standards.

Let us examine its moral qualities from another standpoint. The canal act, containing the tolls exemption, was passed August 24, 1912. The date becomes important in determining as nearly as may be the time when the moral illumination occurred. The President's message was delivered March 5, 1914. Over a year and a half had elapsed before the President discovered the enormity of the act; over a year of service as President before he finds it to be his duty to secure a repeal of the obnoxious measure. In fact, not until he finds the country plunged into difficulties of "even greater delicacy and nearer consequence" by the blundering conduct of his own administration does he urge retreat. In other words, the President in his message contends we were wrong, contends we violated a treaty, contends we endeavored to secure an unjust advantage, admits that for over a year and a half we have held our wrongful position, and now give it up only because we think it safer to do so.

I do not believe we blundered. I do not believe we were mistaken in our rights. I do not believe that because we were big and strong we violated any treaty agreement "right or wrong." I believe we acted fully within our rights. I believe we have fairly and honestly interpreted the treaty. I believe we have not only acted justly but generously to other nations in building the canal and opening it to the commerce of the world on such fair and equitable terms, and I believe that when the final verdict of history shall have been written our action will add glory, and not shame, to the Republic.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. STEPHENS].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California [Mr. STEPHENS] is recognized for five minutes.

NO TOLLS SHALL BE LEVIED UPON VESSELS ENGAGED IN THE COASTWISE TRADE OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. STEPHENS of California. Mr. Speaker, the action of Congress in exempting coastwise ships from the payment of tolls was not hasty. It was taken after mature deliberation. The canal act was reported by the committee to the House of Representatives March 16, 1912. The minority report, advocating free tolls for coastwise vessels, was filed March 20. From that time on, as indeed for many months before, it was known to all Members of Congress, and to most other citizens, that a clause exempting coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls was expected to become a part of the canal law. The House passed the bill May 23 without a roll call—previous votes having indicated a good majority for the bill. It was received by the Senate May 24, and was discussed in committee and on the floor of the Senate until August 10, when it was passed by a vote of 47 to 15. It was approved by the President and became a law August 24, 1912.

For more than five months the question of free tolls had been active, and perhaps uppermost in the minds of Members of Congress and of the people generally. Indeed, "free tolls for American coastwise vessels" was enacted into law at the demand of the people of this country. That a vast majority of our citizens favored free tolls is evidenced by the records in the case. A careful examination made of the Journals of both House and Senate for the second session of the Sixty-second Congress, near the close of which the free-tolls clause was passed, shows the petitions received by Congress were more than 4 to 1 favorable to free tolls through the Panama Canal for coastwise ships of the United States. The natural conclusion is that four men out of every five in the United States believe the action then taken by Congress morally and economically right.

Mr. Speaker, it was undoubtedly the opinion of the Sixty-second Congress, expressed in the final vote for the bill, that this exemption was not a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I sincerely believe that if the personal and private views of the Members of the Sixty-third Congress could be unofficially ascertained in this Capitol to-day, the majority would be of the same opinion as before. The contract between Great Britain and the United States was not violated. The free-tolls clause of the act of 1912 only put into words the exemptions that had been permitted and practiced for almost 100 years in all the ports of both nations.

Mr. Speaker, it may be interesting to know some of the things that have been said concerning an isthmian canal.

Gen. U. S. Grant's words were:

> I commend an American canal, on American soil, to the American people.

President Hayes, in March, 1880, said:

> The policy of this country is a canal under American control. The United States can not consent to surrender this control to any European power. It is the right and duty of the United States to assert and maintain such supervision and authority over any interoceanic canal across the Isthmus that connects North and South America, as will protect our national interest.

President Harrison, referring to an Atlantic-Pacific waterway, said:

Our national policy, now more than ever, calls for its control by this Government.

President Roosevelt, in December, 1901, said to Congress:

In this treaty the old Clayton-Bulwer treaty * * * is abrogated. It (the new one) specifically provides that the United States alone shall do the work of building and assume the responsibility of safeguarding the canal, and shall regulate its neutral use by all nations on terms of equality without the guaranty or interference of any outside nation from any quarter.

The Progressive national platform, in August, 1912, said:

The Panama Canal, built and paid for by the American people, must be used primarily for their benefit. We demand that the canal shall be so operated as to break transportation monopoly now held and misused by the transcontinental railroads by maintaining sea competition with them; that ships directly or indirectly owned or controlled by American railroad corporations shall not be permitted to use the canal; and that American ships engaged in coastwise trade shall pay no tolls.

In January, 1913, Col. Roosevelt said:

I believe that the position of the United States is proper as regards this coastwise traffic. I think that we have the right to free bona fide coastwise traffic from tolls. I think that this does not interfere with the rights of any other nation, because no ships but our own can engage in coastwise traffic, so that there is no discrimination against other ships when we relieve the coastwise traffic from tolls.

President Taft said, in December, 1912:

After full examination of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and of the treaty which preceded it, I feel confident that the exemption of the coastwise vessels of the United States from tolls and the imposition of tolls on vessels of all nations engaged in the foreign trade is not a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

In July, 1912, the Democratic national platform said:

We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal. We also favor legislation forbidding the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned or controlled by railroad carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal.

On August 15, 1912, Hon. Woodrow Wilson, governor of New Jersey and candidate for President, said to an audience of farmers at Washington Park, N. J.:

One of the great objects in cutting that great ditch across the Isthmus of Panama is to allow farmers who are near the Atlantic to ship to the Pacific by way of the Atlantic ports.

Now, at present there are no ships to do that, and one of the bills pending—passed, I believe, yesterday by the Senate as it had passed the House—provides for free tolls for American ships through that canal and prohibits any ship from passing through which is owned by any American railroad company. You see the object of that, don't you? We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage to compete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent.

On March 5, 1914, the same Woodrow Wilson, now President of the United States, appeared before a joint assembly of the two Houses of Congress with a short and sharp command to Congress to repeal the free-tolls clause of the Panama Canal act.

His message was in part as follows:

I have come to ask you for the repeal of that provision of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, which exempts vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States from payment of tolls.

In my judgment, very fully considered and maturely formed, that exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view, and is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal concluded on November 18, 1901.

Woodrow Wilson, President, was so different from Woodrow Wilson, candidate; there was such a complete change of message on March 5, 1914, to Congress from that on August 15, 1912, to the farmers, as to make men ask the reason why. Why should a man rejoice in August, 1912, with the people of the United States because of free tolls, and in March, 1914, before a single ton of freight had passed through the canal, join with Sir Edward Grey, of Great Britain, in an insistent demand for a repeal of free tolls?

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 says:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

Now, Candidate Wilson in August, 1912, must have believed free tolls for American coastwise vessels were not in violation of that clause, else he would not have so strongly favored them as he did in his address before the New Jersey farmers. Candidate Wilson had given almost his whole life to a study of government. For many years he had been a college professor of political economy, and as such was familiar with not only the economics of government but with treaties and their meanings. No doubt he was quite familiar with the full text of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901, and had given its various clauses most careful attention.

May we not suppose that he had given particular attention to which nations had signed the treaty and which had not and why, and also to the fact that the United States was paying every penny of expense for right of way, for construction, for interest, for maintenance, and for operation of the canal, and that Great Britain was paying nothing? He knew, for he was a learned man, which nation was to make and adopt the rules and which observe them, which could change them and which could not. He was well aware, for he was versed in treaties and their meanings, just who was to name the charges and finally determine them "just and equitable," and well he must have known that free tolls or identical charges to English and American vessels alike would not be, could not be, "just and equitable." The United States has paid out almost four hundred millions and will expend two hundred millions more, and such expense must in some way be equalized in order to have charges "just and equitable," as called for in the treaty.

Candidate Wilson must have given "careful consideration" to this probability of free tolls enactment by Congress. Surely no man so able in the science of government and so versed in treaties and their meanings and a candidate for the highest office in the land could or would speak so earnestly, sincerely, and advisingly to the people of the United States as he did through those New Jersey farmers without previous thought and deliberation concerning a matter so vital to the peace and prosperity of the Nation.

Is it any wonder when President Wilson comes to Congress and states an altogether different opinion and without giving any new facts demands of Congress a complete reversal of its former action that Members are somewhat skeptical as to what induced this change of front by Mr. Wilson on the subject of free tolls?

The treaty is not violated by giving free tolls to United States coastwise vessels, for evidently coastwise vessels do not come within the meaning of such international treaties. Coastwise trading is purely a domestic affair. Each nation has exclusive ownership. Great Britain can take no part in ours, nor we in theirs.

In the treaty of 1815 between the United States and Great Britain is to be found this clause:

No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States, nor in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

That is the law to-day in both countries. Its terms seem general enough. Its words make no exception of coastwise vessels, and yet England does except her coastwise vessels from that agreement, and does collect double the charges for American vessels as from its own coastwise steamers, and does it well within her rights and without criticism from America. A recent schedule of charges in British harbors shows the dues payable upon entering the port of Bristol to be:

	Cents.
For every vessel from ports in Africa, South America, the United States of America, etc., per registered ton	27½
For every vessel trading from Ireland, Isle of Man, Scotland, or as a coaster outside the British Channel, per registered ton	11½
For every vessel trading as a coaster from ports in the British Channel, per registered ton	8

And dock tonnage rates on vessels at Liverpool to be:

	Cents.
For British coaster vessels, per ton	6½ to 10½
For east coast of North and South America, etc., per ton	33½

The United States likewise excepts its own coastwise vessels from the general terms of that agreement, and the Supreme Court of the United States has already committed itself in the case of Olsen against Smith, reported in volume 195, United States Supreme Court Reports, 1904, page 332. It was in this case urged that a statute of the State of Texas exempting American coasting vessels from the payment of pilotage charges was a violation of the treaty of 1815 between the United States and Great Britain.

Justice White, now Chief Justice of the United States, in his written opinion, said:

Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage, resulting from the law of the United States, nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels, created by the State law, concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of vessels of the United States in such trade.

In view of the universal exemption practiced in both England and America, in my opinion it can safely be assumed that coastwise vessels are not included in the general term "vessels of commerce" when used in treaties. Coastwise vessels must be specifically mentioned in order to be included.

There were two Hay-Pauncefote treaties—one of 1900, the other of 1901. The first was rejected, the second agreed to.

In Senate Document No. 19, Sixty-third Congress, George C. Butte, Esq., superimposes one upon the other "especially for the light it throws upon what the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty does not mean." The showing is so effective that I quote at length:

The rejected words of the treaty of 1900 are in brackets, the additions made by the treaty of 1901 are inclosed in parentheses and italicized, and what the two have in common appears in ordinary type.

[Article II] (Article III).—[The high contracting parties] (The United States) [desiring to preserve and maintain the "general principle" of neutralization established in Article VIII of the Clayton-Bulwer convention adopt] (adopts) as the basis of [such] (the) neutralization (of such ship canal) the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention [between Great Britain and certain other powers] (of Constantinople), signed [at Constantinople October 29, 1888] (the 28th October, 1888), for the free navigation of the Suez [Maritime] Canal, that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open [in time of war as in time of peace] to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations (observing these rules), on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any (such) nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. (Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.)

(The remaining subheads of this article in both treaties contain the same provisions, with the exception of subhead 7.)

[7. No fortifications shall be erected commanding the canal or the waters adjacent.] The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

(The foregoing sentence was moved to subhead 2 in the later treaty.)

A deep and thorough study of the above, and of the entire treaties of 1815, 1850, 1900, and 1901, the conditions calling for them, the correspondence connected with them, and the construction given them, as evidenced by the practices prevailing since, should convince most fair-minded men that the United States is not violating any treaty obligation when it exempts its own coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls through the Panama Canal.

If we repeal this exemption clause, if we levy tolls upon our coastwise vessels passing through the canal, we will not materially benefit any great number of citizens of the United States. Then whom will it benefit? Why, the shipbuilding companies of England, and every manufacturing and producing interest in the British Isles and British possessions. How will it benefit them? Why, by enabling them to undersell us to that extent in our own markets. Undersell us with goods and produce manufactured and grown in British possessions by underpaid labor. It will also add greatly to the earnings of the Canadian, Grand Trunk, and other transcontinental railways at the unwarranted expense of every American consumer.

Is not the United States doing enough for England when it pays every cent of the cost and maintenance of the canal for all time to come? Why should not we be "just and equitable" to coastwise shipping exclusively our own, when it is transporting freight from a port that is ours to a port also our own, through a canal built in our own territory, paid for with our own money, and acknowledged by all the world to belong to us?

Not a single vessel given free tolls under the clause of the law which President Wilson asks us to repeal will, while engaged in this traffic, ever be for one moment in waters belonging to any other nation. Every coastwise vessel of the United States, going from Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Charleston, New Orleans, or Galveston through the canal to San Diego, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Portland, or Seattle, or vice versa, will go through waters belonging exclusively to the United States or else to all the world in common. None of them will belong to England. Why should this administration add another to the many English things it has done in the one long year it has been in power?

When the House assembled for the first time under this administration, the desks and individual chairs had been taken from this Chamber, and benches provided like those in the British Parliament.

Next day the President in person delivered an address to a joint session of the Senate and House of Representatives, just as King George does to the British Parliament.

Several times since, the Chief Magistrate has visited this building, and at such times, it has been said, Democratic Senators and Representatives were commanded to appear before him for instruction, just as happens in dear old London.

Just a few days ago American Ambassador Page, in an address to the Associated Chambers of Commerce of London, is reported as saying:

I will not say we have constructed the Panama Canal for you, but I will say most truly that it adds greatly to the pleasure of building that great work that it is you who will most profit by it.

And now comes the President seeking the repeal of the tolls-exemption clause, striving with every power he has to levy taxes on shipping wholly and solely American, apparently to please Great Britain. Are we being Britainized? President Cleveland said, December 17, 1895:

There is no calamity which a great nation can invite which equals that which follows a supine submission to wrong and injustice and the consequent loss of national self-respect and honor, beneath which are shielded and defended a people's safety and greatness.

What will the American people say if we now submit to a construction of the treaty, contrary to the understanding of those who made and confirmed it, and totally different from the interpretation placed upon similar clauses where the complaining power was affected adversely?

Coast-to-coast commerce through the Panama Canal is commerce between the States, just the same as commerce that goes down the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers from Cincinnati and St. Louis to New Orleans, or across the Great Lakes from Duluth to Chicago, Cleveland, and Buffalo, or along the seacoast from Boston, New York, and Philadelphia to Charleston, Pensacola, New Orleans, and Galveston. Tolls are not levied on any ships, even though privately owned, that carry freight on our rivers or lakes or harbors, although all of them have been improved at the expense of the Government. Then why should we exact tolls from commerce wholly and forever American, as it goes through another American waterway, dug in soil that now belongs to the United States, planned by American engineers, carried on by American brains and courage, and paid for to the last dollar with American money? We should exempt our coastwise trade, our between-the-States commerce, from the payment of tolls through our own Panama Canal. We have done so by law, and a repeal of that law now will work an irreparable injury to the honor and prosperity of the American people.

Are free tolls economically wise? Will a reduction of $1.20 per ton in freight charges benefit the consumer? Experience has taught us all that where there is legitimate competition the consumer gets the benefit of the reduction. The use of the Panama Canal by American vessels is limited to those vessels which are not railroad owned or controlled, but the use of our Government-improved rivers, harbors, and lakes is not. We are more likely to have legitimate competition through the Panama Canal than on other waterways.

The wide distribution of the agricultural and manufactured products of this country should and does benefit the laborer, the grower, the manufacturer, the transportation company, and the consumer.

Low water rates can not long prevail without causing some similar reduction in rail rates. Those who live in regions tributary to great rivers and harbors benefit without question, and those farther inland will benefit even more in the long run.

The great Middle West will not only gain through reduced rates following low water rates, but will be wonderfully advanced through the quick development of territory adjacent or tributary to the overland railroads.

If the volume of through overland business is lessened because of coast-to-coast water competition, then the great transcontinental railways will hasten into intense cultivation and promotion of their own territorial resources. Farmers and factories and new communities will be encouraged, new railroad lines—feeders to the main lines—will be built, and a prosperity greater than any yet seen will come to those who dwell far from navigable waters.

The building of the second transcontinental railway did not lessen or stop the growth along the first one, nor did the third one injure either the second or the first, nor the fourth one decrease the prosperity in territories adjacent to either of the others; indeed, the coming of each new road really and truly added to the business and the general welfare and prosperity of all communities near the older ones.

We have done only that which all nations do with their own. We have answered the demands of our people for free tolls. We have received the constructive approval of 13,000,000 voters. Now we are asked to confess that we knowingly did wrong; that we who were Members of the last Congress did a dishonorable thing, and that every man who was elected to national office in November, 1912, on a platform unequivocally for free tolls was at that time dishonestly making promises to "catch flies"—and voters.

Others may confess it, but I can not. Free tolls for American coastwise shipping through an American waterway was right a hundred years ago and is right to-day. I saw only justice and equity to all nations when I voted first for free tolls, but now I see duty added to justice and equity—duty to the Red, White, and Blue.

Mr. Speaker, if there was good reason I could follow the President almost anywhere in behalf of the honor, the peace, or the prosperity of the American people. I yield to no man in patriotism or in willingness to sacrifice for a righteous cause.

But surely no jury would say that sufficient reason has been advanced to justify a Member of Congress in yielding his right to vote according to his best judgment, formed after "careful consideration and mature deliberation."

I honor and respect President Wilson for his honesty and sincerity. I have commended him often; so has every Member of Congress; but he has given us no facts, no probabilities, no possibilities to warrant this surrender of what was yesterday an inalienable right.

Many of the leaders of the President's own party are not in sympathy with the demand that has been made. Many of the ablest Democrats in Congress are unwilling to go back on their party platform, unwilling to yield up that which we can never get back—our right to control our own canal—just to please one man, who insists without having given to any Member of House or Senate, so far as I know, any reasons whatever for the repeal of free tolls.

Mr. Speaker, neither the English Government nor that of the United States had any thought of taxing American coastwise ships when the treaty was made. The United States Senate agreed at the time that such were not included in the tolls clause, else the treaty would not have been confirmed.

In my judgment the treaty will not be violated by giving free tolls to American coastwise vessels. The policy is economically sound. I voted for free tolls in the last Congress. I shall vote for free tolls in this Congress.

Mr. Speaker, at this moment I desire to read two communications, one of which plainly indicates an overwhelming sentiment for free tolls and the other the reasons why:

LOS ANGELES CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Los Angeles, Cal., July 31, 1912.

Hon. WILLIAM D. STEPHENS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: It may be interesting to you to know the result of the request for the approval or disapproval of the membership of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce of the action of its board of directors in favor of freedom from tolls for American ships passing through the Panama Canal, and in opposition to the operation through the canal of ships owned in whole or in part by railway corporations engaged in the coastwise trade.

On July 18 we sent out a circular, copy of which is inclosed, asking the approval or disapproval of our individual membership of over 3,000. Up to this date we have received 1,074 replies. Of these, 1,036 are in approval of the position taken by the chamber and 38 in disapproval.

Very truly, yours,

H. Z. OSBORNE, President.

Resolution in re Panama Canal tolls.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., March 6, 1914.

Whereas the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, in association with the principal chambers of commerce of the Pacific coast, for years advocated the passage by Congress of a bill to exempt American shipping engaged in the coastwise trade from the payment of tolls for passing through the Panama Canal, and conducted an active and effective national campaign in the way of presenting the facts to the people and to Congress; and

Whereas Congress, in prescribing rules to be observed by shipping in the use of the Panama Canal, as provided in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, has enacted into a law a provision making such exemption, which act was approved by the President and is now a law; and

Whereas subsequently the Government of Great Britain entered a protest against such exemption from tolls to American ships engaged in the coastwise trade as a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; and

Whereas President Wilson has delivered an address to Congress advocating the repeal of the law making such exemption from the payment of tolls: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, That while we entertain for the President of the United States the profound respect which is due to his exalted official position and to his high character as a man, we are unable to find in his address any sufficient reason for the retrograde step which he advocates, and this body is still of the opinion, in view of the fact that American vessels have for a hundred years enjoyed the exclusive right of traffic between American ports and the shipping of Great Britain or of any foreign country has never been permitted to engage in such traffic, that Great Britain nor any other Government has any interest whatever in the rules which may be laid down by the American Government for its shipping passing through an American canal in a territory admittedly within American sovereignty.

Resolved, That we are unable to agree with the President that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty has been violated for the further reason that this treaty was framed to facilitate the building of a canal through foreign territory, either Nicaragua or Colombia; its construction finally through American territory, the Panama Canal Zone, in our opinion, changed the conditions vitally, and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty should be construed in accordance with those changed conditions.

Be it further resolved, That while the commercial interests of the Pacific coast and of the entire country would suffer from a repeal of the law exempting American shipping from the payment of such tolls, a more serious national objection to the course advocated by the President would be the admission, which is also contained in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, that the United States would have no further military right within the Canal Zone than that of maintaining a military police along the canal to protect it against lawlessness and disorder, and the further construction which might be placed upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that the vessels of a nation at war with the United States would have the same rights in the canal as those to which war vessels of this country might be entitled.

Resolved further, That this chamber earnestly urges the Senators and Representatives of the Pacific coast and of the entire country to stand firmly against the proposed recession from its former position and in favor of the American policy toward its own shipping of freedom from foreign control and of the right to pass freely through American waterways with entire freedom from payment of tolls or tribute of any character.

LOUIS M. COLE, President.

Attest:

FRANK WIGGINS, Secretary.

[Applause.]

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, no ordinary question confronts the Congress. Under the law American coastwise vessels are exempt from tolls in the use of the Panama Canal. The President has urged the repeal of that law. While expressing the belief that the "exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view and is in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal, concluded on November 18, 1901," his request is not made chiefly for such reasons. Apart from any differences which may exist amongst us on those questions the President states that "everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption" for the repeal of which he has asked. He states in addition that the legislation is needed in support of the foreign policy of the administration and that unless the exemption be repealed it will increase the difficulties of adjusting other matters in our relations with foreign nations.

Any request of the President is entitled to respectful, earnest, and fearless consideration. Couched in such terms as the one now pending, it compels the Congress to cast aside partisanship and prejudice and to deal with the question from the most patriotic motives.

The President justly enjoys the respect and the confidence of the country. His patient and earnest efforts to have enacted laws designed to eliminate the gross evils and injustices existing in our financial and industrial systems have been universally commended. The results attained during his brief incumbency of his present office have awakened hope in the hearts of many patriotic men who were despairing of the useful continuance of our free institutions, while the achievements of our party under his enlightened leadership have been little less than marvelous, and promise much for its further usefulness.

With those who condemn the President for his present views I have no sympathy. I am convinced that he has acted conscientiously and upon a deliberately matured judgment. The conclusions which I have reached are the result of equally conscientious and painstaking consideration. These conclusions are not of recent origin. As a member of the Committee on Appropriations since 1905, I have visited the Canal Zone five times. During that time I have passed upon appropriations for construction and fortifications aggregating $292,000,000, and I have critically investigated questions involved in the use of the canal by our own vessels as well as by those of foreign nations.

An overpowering conviction, which I have been unable to dispel, that the proposed repeal is weighted with evil of far-reaching extent to the country, compels me to oppose the pending measure. [Applause.]

As a participant in the legislation for the construction of the canal I unhesitatingly assert that the Congress sought chiefly these purposes: (a) To provide effective competition with the transcontinental railroads; (b) to increase the efficiency of our naval forces; (c) to prevent the control of an isthmian canal by a European power.

The belief, too, was quite prevalent that the extraordinary expenditure of treasure would not be unavailing in the legitimate development of American shipping.

From the earliest days of the Republic the great bulk of our commerce had been carried in American ships. In 1862 foreign bottoms for the first time in more than 50 years carried more than 50 per cent of our commerce, and from that time foreign ships have increasingly supplanted American ships in our oversea trade. To such an extent have American ships been crowded out that in 1913 they carried only 8.9 per cent of our imports and exports.

The American people can hardly be regarded as so altruistic as to have intended that the expenditure of $400,000,000 should be chiefly for the benefit of other nations and particularly for the advantage of Great Britain. [Applause.] It must be remembered that she has a greater tonnage than all other maritime nations combined. Her ships will use the canal to a greater extent than those of any other nation. The completion of the canal will bring Asia and Australia and the west coast of British Columbia into closer and quicker communication with Canada's Atlantic seaboard and with the British Isles. Excepting in the event of war with us, the fleets of Great Britain will have equal advantage in operating from ocean to ocean for the protection and defense of her many possessions. The railroads that traverse the British territory to our north, touching rich and developing lands, will undoubtedly be affected in several important aspects by the operation of the canal. As Great Britain gains so much from its opening, and as the interests of her subjects may be so vitally affected by the success of our people, protests arising from such a source should be considered in the light of these facts. [Applause.]

I can not admit that the exemption of our coastwise ships is a mistaken economic policy.

The Panama Canal bill passed the House on May 23, 1912. The provision exempting American ships from tolls was adopted after a vigorous and thorough discussion. Subsequently the Democratic national convention adopted as part of the Democratic platform this declaration:

We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal. We also favor legislation forbidding the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned or controlled by carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal.

Later the bill passed the Senate and was approved by President Taft.

On August 15, 1912, President Wilson, then governor of New Jersey and the Democratic candidate for the Presidency, heartily approved the bill and pointed out the advantages to follow from the legislation, as well as its importance in the securing of effective competition with the transcontinental railroads.

The platform of the so-called Progressive Party declared for the exemption of American ships from tolls, and later former President Roosevelt stated his belief that we had the right to exempt our coastwise traffic from tolls without infringing the rights of any other nation.

But the President has now appealed to the Congress for the repeal of the provision exempting American coastwise shipping from tolls. When the Panama Canal act was pending in the House, I voted for the exemption of American ships. The platform of my party, framed under the personal domination of the present Secretary of State, declared for such freedom from tolls for American ships. I am now urged to reverse my previous action and to repudiate the platform for the reason that all other nations believe our position is wrong, and that such action is necessary to enable other matters pending with other nations to be adjusted.

The fact that Great Britain and other nations have much more at stake in this controversy about tolls than the United States takes from the opinion expressed by the representatives of other nations the force it might have if they were disinterested and impartial critics.

In his critical paper, "A Study on the Tolls Question," Mr. George C. Butte says:

In the present controversy between Great Britain and the United States it is an important fact that the construction placed by Great Britain upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, if recognized, will result in an unquestionable and unmixed national profit to Great Britain. On the other hand, it is debatable whether the legislation of the United States which is called in question will be a national benefit to the United States. * * * Great Britain has decidedly more to gain by the controversy than the United States has to lose.

We should not be quick to surrender any right to Great Britain, and we should not do so in any event unless her claims are substantiated so conclusively as to result in practical unanimity of opinion among those in this country competent to judge.

There is no unanimity of opinion among Americans competent to pass on this question that our action exempting American coastwise ships from tolls is beyond our rights. Sir Edward Grey, the secretary of state for foreign affairs for Great Britain, in his note of November 14, 1912, while strenuously contending for the construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty urged by Great Britain, makes this memorable statement:

But they (His Majesty's Government) recognize that many persons of note in the United States, whose opinions are entitled to great weight, hold that the provisions of this act do not infringe the convention obligations by which the United States is bound, and under these circumstances they desire to state their perfect readiness to arbitrate if the Government of the United States would prefer to take this course.

Although His Majesty's Government recognizes the weight of the opinion of the notable men of this country who insist that we have acted within our rights, we are asked to abandon our pretensions, to reverse our action, to surrender our rights in order to demonstrate our capacity for generosity. [Applause.] It will be a grave mistake to do so. Such action is pregnant with danger. Sir Edward Grey's note, to which I have alluded, discloses that such action on our part will be but the beginning. Other demands will quickly follow. What other significance can be attached to the statement in the note that if the provisions in section 11 of the canal act prohibiting the use of the canal to railroad-owned vessels, or to those of owners who have violated the Sherman antitrust law, are to be applied to British vessels that the right is reserved to raise such other objections as may seem justified?

It is further stated that the objections submitted have been confined within the narrowest limits possible. Suppose those limits are put aside. What demands will then be made?

The propriety or the wisdom of the economic policy involved in our action exempting American ships is of trifling significance compared with this vital, fundamental, and overshadowing question as to whether any foreign power, under any pretext, shall dictate and determine what we shall do in the control of the canal built by ourselves at an expenditure of $400,000,000. [Applause.]

The more thoroughly the facts are considered the less substance remains to the claim of Great Britain.

To appreciate accurately the question in controversy it is necessary to understand the history of the canal movement in this country, which led finally to the adoption of the policy of a wholly American canal. Former Secretary of State Olney has pointed out succinctly the various steps in the development of our policy. Perhaps the earliest definite American notion was the intimation that the canal should be built not "by the support and unassisted efforts of any one power" but "by common means and united exertion." Later the view prevailed that the canal should be built by the State owning the route of the canal, or by a company clothed by such State with the necessary power. This view resulted in the treaty of 1846 between the United States and New Granada, now Colombia, whereby the citizens of the United States were granted equal treatment with the citizens of New Granada as respects any mode of transportation across the Isthmus in return for the guaranteed neutrality by the United States of the Isthmus. The belief quickly gained, however, that the canal could not be built under such conditions.

Great Britain at that time was claiming a protectorate over the Mosquito Coast and threatening to seize Greytown, the eastern terminus of the Nicaraguan route. That route was then almost universally favored. A somewhat prevalent belief existed that the financial support required to build the canal could the more readily be obtained if its neutrality were guaranteed by the United States and Great Britain jointly. All of those conditions resulted in the very much discussed Clayton-Bulwer treaty between the United States and Great Britain in 1850. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty related to interoceanic communication across Central America and did not affect the Isthmus of Panama. The treaty provided for a canal to be built by the State owning the route or by some company authorized by the State to do so. It was agreed by the United States and Great Britain that neither Government would build the canal nor participate directly or indirectly in its building nor obtain exclusive control over it. The manner in which each Government could aid was specifically determined and provision for the neutralization was made.

Both the United States and Great Britain were to maintain the neutrality of the canal, and as a condition of such action the citizens or subjects of the contracting Governments were to enjoy the same rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the canal, "charges and conditions of traffic to be approved as just and equitable" by the two Governments. All other friendly States were to be invited to join in contributing to the construction of the canal. This invitation was to carry the assurance that the citizens or subjects of such States should enjoy the equal terms and conditions of those of the United States and Great Britain, if such States granted the same protection required from the United States and Great Britain.

Article 8 of that treaty, upon which so much stress is laid at the present time by those supporting the contention of Great Britain, reads as follows:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the Isthmus which connects North and South America.

In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain shall engage to afford.

It must be remembered that neither the United States nor Great Britain was permitted to build the canal. Neither could either Government obtain or maintain exclusive control of it. They therefore provided that for the protection which they engaged to extend that the party which built the canal should impose no charge upon nor attach any condition to traffic which those two Governments did not approve of as just and equitable; that as their protection was to be jointly extended their citizens or subjects were to use the canal on equal terms, as could the citizens or subjects of every other country willing to participate with the United States and Great Britain in equal measure in protecting the canal.

The agreement to protect the canal was conditional upon the owner of the canal imposing just and equitable charges and conditions and permitting the use of the canal upon equal terms by the citizens or subjects of the two powers.

The general principle to be established was clearly the neutralization, the safety, of the canal; the equal terms in its use were incidental thereto and conditional upon the agreement to protect.

The two notable features of this phase of the American canal policy—are, first, the self-denying ordinance preventing the United States or Great Britain from building or controlling the canal; and, second, the clear recognition of a State constructing on its own territory an artificial waterway like the canal to dictate the conditions of its use, as by permitting the use to some parties on condition of their undertaking to protect the canal and denying its use to other parties not willing to undertake such protection.

Says Mr. Olney—

This treaty remained in force for 51 years. It was superseded in 1901 by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, by which it was expressly abrogated. In the preamble of both of the Hay-Pauncefote treaties it was declared that the purpose was to remove any objection which might arise out of the Clayton-Bulwer convention to the construction of the canal under the auspices of the United States without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established under article 8 of that treaty.

Everyone will recall that sentiment had so developed in this country for a canal controlled exclusively by the United States that it had become overwhelming. In 1900, and for years theretofore, it was quite generally believed by the people that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was dead. The negation in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty removed any possible objection which might have been urged still existed to the United States building the canal itself, and it relieved Great Britain of all obligation to extend protection to the canal. The United States assumed the entire burden and responsibility of neutralization.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty, as ratified and now in force, differed materially in important respects from the treaty as first proposed.

The original draft required the United States and Great Britain to bring the treaty to the notice of other powers and to invite them to adhere to it. Objection by the Senate resulted in the elimination of that provision, whereupon Great Britain insisted upon being relieved from the proposed continuance of her obligation to join the United States in protecting the canal.

Under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty the United States and Great Britain would have made rules to be observed by other nations desiring equal treatment in the use of the canal; but under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty as ratified the United States, alone responsible for the neutrality of the canal, assumed the burden of making the rules to be observed.

The first treaty submitted to the Senate also provided for the fortification of the canal. This is not in the treaty as ratified. Yet we are fortifying the canal, and our right to do so has been expressly conceded by Great Britain. Lord Lansdowne, in a memorandum dated August 3, 1901, admitted such right and also pointed out that the omission of the requirements that Great Britain should be jointly bound to defend the neutrality of the canal, and the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, materially diminished the obligations of Great Britain.

Sir Edward Grey, in his note, indicated that he also understood the marked change in the relation of Great Britain to the canal, as disclosed by the statement:

It certainly was not the intention of His Majesty's Government that any responsibility for the protection of the canal should attach to them in the future.

Relieved from the obligation to protect, Great Britain lost the right to demand the condition of affording that protection, to wit, the use of the canal upon terms of equality with the United States. [Applause.]

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty, so far as pertinent to this discussion, is as follows:

ARTICLE 1. The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th of April, 1850.

ART. 2. It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ART. 3. The United States adopts, as the basis of neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th day of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

"1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

"2. The canal shall never be blockaded nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

"3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service. Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of belligerents.

"4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

"5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

"6. The plant, establishment, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be a part thereof, for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war as in time of peace shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal."

ART. 4. It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the aforementioned canal shall affect the general principles of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

The controversy hinges upon whether the words "of all nations," used in rule 1, includes or excludes the United States.

Much of the misunderstanding of what this treaty means arises from the fact that rule 1 is usually quoted alone and apart from the rest of the treaty. Thus it is usually said that there can be no discrimination in favor of vessels of the United States because the treaty provides—

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

But that rule segregated in that way may have a meaning entirely different from that actually conveyed and intended when read with the words which precede in articles 2 and 3. Read thus it appears that the—United States shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ART. 3. The United States adopts, as the basis of neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th day of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, etc.

In other words, the United States has not agreed that the vessels of commerce and of war of every nation observing the rules shall be accorded the same terms as are such vessels of the United States; but as the owner of the canal, as the Government which has constructed and paid out of its Treasury for the construction of the canal, relieved from the obligation to make rules jointly with Great Britain, the United States has adopted the rules to be observed by other nations to secure for their vessels equality of treatment one with the other, with no limitation other than that the charges and the conditions shall be just and equitable.

As first proposed the treaty would have read "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations which shall agree to observe these rules."

To avoid the necessity of other agreements Mr. Hay suggested that instead of the words "all nations which shall agree to observe these rules" there should be substituted "all nations observing these rules," and in place of the words "any nation so agreeing" the words "any such nation."

Lord Lansdowne, in his memorandum of September 12, 1901, pointed out that these amendments were acceptable, since they seemed equally efficacious for the purpose in view "of insuring that Great Britain should not be placed in a less advantageous position than other powers, while they stopped short of conferring upon other nations a contractual right to the use of the canal." [Applause.]

The sole judge of the justice and the equity of the charges and conditions is the United States; no other nation should be permitted to put its opinion successfully against the judgment of our country to the detriment of our own trade and of our own people.

The United States, says Mr. Butte, are the Interstate Commission of the world—to employ an allusion to a well-known institution of theirs—in respect of all traffic that uses the Panama Canal route. To what extent they will exercise this power and discharge this responsibility is a matter of their own sense of duty and propriety, and need not be speculated about here. They will do their own shipping an injustice if they do not exercise this power freely. The thing to be emphasized here is that they are the sole judges of what conditions of traffic are just and equitable. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty confers no veto right on Great Britain. It ill behooves Great Britain to seek to prescribe to the United States any standard of equality at all, and least of all to say to them that equality is attained by the levying of identical tolls, irrespective of other conditions of traffic.

The contention of Great Britain is that under rule 1 her vessels of commerce are entitled to the same or identical treatment as vessels of the United States. The rule, however, covers vessels of war as well as vessels of commerce. No demand has yet been made regarding vessels of war. The rule is equally applicable to vessels of both classes, and if it be conceded that we can not differentiate American vessels of commerce from similar vessels of other nations, it follows that vessels of war can not be deprived of privileges similar to those accorded to war vessels of the United States.

The committee reporting this bill assert that—

As owner it would be folly for the Government to take money out of the Treasury and pay it back into the Treasury for its war vessels. Its own vessels, not the vessels of its citizens, but the vessels of the United States as a corporation, may pass as incident to the construction and regulation and management.

This assertion will not bear critical analysis. The expression "all nations" must include their citizens and subjects as well as the nations themselves. If the construction is to prevail that the United States is included within the provisions of rule 1, and if war vessels of the United States can not be affected by the treaty, why was provision made for war vessels as well as for vessels of commerce?

If the United States are included in the expression "all nations" then its vessels of war as well as the vessels of commerce of its citizens must be treated in identically the same manner as the vessels of war or of commerce of Great Britain or of any other nation. It would not alone be folly to insist upon the idle ceremony of officers of warships of the United States paying tolls to officers of our Army in charge of the canal, but it would be ridiculous to pretend that such a performance was a charge upon the vessels of a character to which war vessels of other nations could be justly subjected.

If the United States as the owner of the canal is subject to rule 1 it is bound by the other rules adopted for observance in the use of the canal. To adopt such a construction is to make futile, if not ridiculous, the expenditure of many millions on the Canal Zone. We are constructing storehouses, coaling plants, dry docks, repair shops, and providing many other facilities which will make the canal a great arsenal and depot of supplies for use in the time of war. If the use of the canal must be upon "terms of entire equality" and without discrimination in our own favor and against other nations "in respect to the conditions and charges of traffic," then the United States is forbidden to exercise any right of war, or to take any stores except so far as may be strictly necessary, or to embark or disembark troops and munitions of war, or to retain our vessels in the canal or within 3 miles of it during the time of war, except in case of distress, or to do any of the other important acts which we are planning and arranging at the expense of many millions of treasure to do should the necessity ever arise. To what advantage are we expending $400,000,000 if we have made an agreement so inconsistent with our country's welfare? But we have not done so. Great Britain concedes our right to do all of these things prohibited to other nations for the use of the canal upon terms of equality among themselves. If six of the seven rules do not require observance by the United States, which adopted them, where is the language that compels a construction of the first rule in a manner harmful to our own interests? [Applause.]

In the majority report Secretary Olney is quoted as construing the treaty against the contention for which I have argued. The committee does Mr. Olney a grave injustice. The memorandum from which the committee quotes was prepared in 1896, five years prior to the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. An examination of the memorandum discloses that the quotation is from the argument which Mr. Olney advanced to refute the contention of Secretary Frelinghuysen that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was voidable. But by no distortion of the meaning of words is it possible successfully to make it appear that Mr. Olney was insisting that Great Britain was entitled to rights identical with those of the United States in a canal which might be built by the latter Government at the Isthmus of Panama.

Secretary Olney's opinion of our rights under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty has been expressed in concise and unmistakable terms. In an address on the Panama Canal tolls legislation and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, read before the American Society of International Law, at Washington, D. C., on April 25, 1913, he said:

On the grounds and in view of the considerations above stated, the United States may contend, and it is believed can rightfully contend, that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of November, 1901, does not, as justly interpreted, prevent the United States from exempting its coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls for the use of the Panama Canal.

He is not alone in this view. Other eminent authorities both here and abroad have expressed the same opinion.

Thus Mr. Butte has said:

That the treaty was never intended expressly to restrict the power of the United States, either in time of war or in time of peace, to regulate as to her own vessels of war or of commerce, coastwise or foreign, in any way she sees fit. This is a sane and reasonable conclusion and the only one that harmonizes with all the provisions of the treaty.

Mr. Edward S. Cox-Sinclair in his article in the November, 1912, London Law Magazine and Review concludes:

That the United States can support its action on the precise words of the material articles of the treaty; that its case is strengthened by reference to the preamble and context; and that its case is difficult to challenge on the ground of general justice.

Mr. C. H. Hereshoff-Bartlett in an article in the same publication says:

It is inconceivable that the United States, when it agreed in the treaty that the canal should be free and open to the vessels of commerce of all nations, intended to recognize or to feel itself bound to recognize on terms of entire equality foreign vessels of commerce with those of its own, engaged in domestic or coastwise trade, or to so restrict its sovereign authority over its own commerce that it could not consistently with the treaty abolish tolls on its own shipping that might be entirely foreign to the conceptions of the American people and inconsistent with their commercial interests.

I have always believed that we have the right, and should exercise it, to exempt our vessels in the foreign as well as in the domestic trade from tolls in use of the Panama Canal. [Applause.]

The pending controversy, however, arises over the objection of Great Britain to the exemption of our coastwise vessels. In the note of A. Mitchell Innes, the chargé d'affaires of the British Embassy, under date of July 8, 1912, the position of Great Britain was succinctly summarized. It was insisted that to exempt American vessels in the foreign trade would violate the treaty; to subject such vessels to tolls to be refunded would perhaps meet the letter, but be violative of the spirit of the treaty; that to exempt from tolls such vessels in the coastwise trade, while perhaps not in violation of the treaty, was objectionable because it was not believed that the exemption could be confined to coastwise shipping.

That protest was made after the canal bill had passed the House. When the bill was enacted into law vessels in the foreign trade were not granted exemption; no provision existed to refund tolls to such vessels, but the coastwise trade was exempted.

The reasonable demands of Great Britain had been met in a spirit of liberality by the Congress. But such action was insufficient to satisfy that power, which still seems to believe that her rights in the canal are identical with those of the United States.

Great Britain immediately made further protest. So successful was she in the first attempt to dominate our property that the claim against our coastwise trade was pressed more emphatically and notice was given that additional demands would probably be made, as I have heretofore pointed out, when this further concession was obtained.

The question of the treatment of coastwise trade has long been definitely settled by practices common to the United States and to Great Britain. The treaty of 1815 between those Governments provides in article 2:

No higher or other duties shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States; nor in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

This provision is as broad and is as comprehensive in its terms as the wording of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; yet neither Government has contended that its provisions prevent discriminations in favor of their respective coastwise shipping. In the United States the question has been raised and definitely determined by the United States Supreme Court in Olsen versus Smith (195 U. S., 332).

The question determined is concisely stated in the syllabus in the following language:

A State pilotage law subjecting all vessels, domestic and foreign, engaged in foreign trade to pilotage regulation, but which exempts, pursuant to law, coastwise steam vessels of the United States, is not in conflict with provisions in the treaty between the United States and Great Britain to the effect that British vessels shall not be subject to any higher or other charges than vessels of the United States.

The committee, in its report on the bill under discussion, attempts to avoid the force of this decision by asserting that the coastwise trade is expressly saved by article 3 from the operation of the treaty, but the wording of the treaty and particularly of article 3, upon which reliance is placed, does not justify the committee's conclusion. Article 3 expressly reserves certain rights and privileges from vessels of the United States permitted to visit the "principal settlements of the British dominions in the East Indies, videlicet: Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, and Prince of Wales Island," but does not apply generally to the coastwise shipping of the two countries in other trade.

Moreover, the decision of the Supreme Court is placed definitely upon other grounds. Mr. Justice White, in the opinion of the court, said:

Nor is there any merit in the contention that, as the vessel in question was a British vessel coming from a foreign port, the State laws concerning pilotage are in conflict with a treaty between Great Britain and the United States, providing that "no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States." Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage, resulting from the law of the United States, nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by State law, concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of vessels of the United States in such trade.

If the treaty expressly saved the vessels in the coastwise trade, as asserted by the committee, is it credible that such provisions would not have been found and relied upon by the United States Supreme Court when the question was before it?

Great Britain, however, has construed the treaty in the same manner. British vessels plying between various British ports in Great Britain are subject to charges less burdensome than American vessels from the United States to the same ports. Great Britain has reserved her coastwise shipping from the provisions of 31 commercial treaties. There is no specific reservation in the treaty of 1815. Yet for practically a century she has construed it as not applicable to her coastwise shipping. If the expressions "British vessels" and "vessels of the United States" do not apply to vessels of either country in the coastwise trade, under what pretense is it urged that the expression "vessels of commerce of all nations" in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty does include the coastwise shipping? [Applause.]

To justify their contention the advocates of this bill have frequently asserted that the United States is estopped from exempting its coastwise shipping because of its own successful contention regarding the use of the Welland and other Canadian canals and waters.

The treaty of 1871, commonly known as the "treaty of Washington," provided for the adjustment of many matters in dispute between the two countries. Among them were the so-called "Alabama claims," certain fishery questions, regulation of trade relations between the United States and the Dominion of Canada, and the navigation of certain canals and waters both within the respective countries as well as boundary waters thereof. The wording of article 27 upon which the United States successfully relied completely justifies its contention, and is in explicit language which differs essentially from the wording of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Article 27 of the "treaty of Washington" provides—

The Government of Her Britannic Majesty engages to urge upon the Dominion of Canada to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion.

The United States agreed that the British subjects should enjoy the use of the St. Clair Flats Canal "on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States."

In the report accompanying the bill the words "on terms of equality" are quoted. The following significant words are omitted. [Applause.]

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty will be searched in vain for any such clear and unmistakable expression. If such equality were intended, Great Britain, with its noted skill in diplomatic negotiations, would never have consented to agree to a treaty about the terms of which there could be controversy regarding rights and privileges of so vital a character.

Secretary Olney declares:

The principle is well settled that a State conveys away its rights of sovereignty or property only by terms which are clear and express and are not susceptible of any other reasonable construction. If the terms are vague and of doubtful import, the presumption is against the State's intention to part with or abridge its jurisdictional or property rights.

The United States has been granted the Canal Zone in perpetuity. It has the sovereignty of the zone. It is the owner of the canal. It has liberally poured out its treasure in an unprecedented amount to confer upon the nations of the world the boon of an interoceanic canal—the dream of four centuries. It has assumed all the burden and responsibility of maintaining the canal free from interference for the welfare of all mankind. Is it now, as the tremendous task which has taxed our resources and commanded the admiration of the world is reaching completion, to be coerced or cajoled into the intolerable position of having its control of its own property determined in the foreign office of any other nation? [Applause.] What demands are to follow if this one be granted can not be foreseen. Intimations have been given, however, which can not be ignored.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. I yield to the gentleman from New York 10 minutes more. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. I thank the gentleman.

Great Britain has announced that she is indifferent to regulations which may cripple or seriously impair American shipping so long as they do not operate to the disadvantage of her subjects. We may prohibit the use of the canal to American vessels owned by railroads, we may prohibit the use of the canal to American vessels whose owners violate the Sherman antitrust law, but if similar regulations are applied to British vessels—vessels owned by the Canadian Pacific, the Grand Trunk, or any other Canadian railroad—then, in the admonition of Sir Edward Grey, His Majesty's Government reserves "the right to examine the matter further and to raise such contentions as may seem justified."

Judging by the course of Great Britain thus far, her protests and demands will not then be ended. Other and more surprising and more impertinent objections are likely to be advanced.

Under article 19 of the treaty negotiated in 1903 between the United States and Panama, the right is secured to Panama to transport over the canal its vessels and its troops and munitions of war in such vessels at all times without paying charges of any kind. For nine years this treaty was unchallenged by Great Britain. In the note of Sir Edward Grey of November 14, 1912, however, he points out that as vessels of Panama will contribute nothing to the upkeep of the canal, that the burden resulting on vessels paying tolls will to that extent be increased, and the result will be the infringement of Great Britain's rights to have tolls and conditions of traffic just and equitable.

It is little wonder that Secretary Knox, in his communication of January 17, 1913, dismissed this protest with scant consideration. Such a provision was included in the Hay-Herran treaty of 1903 with Colombia, prior to the separation of Panama from that country, and no protest was ever lodged against it by Great Britain. Our Government could hardly have been otherwise than surprised, if not shocked, and thus awakened to the supreme importance of resisting any unjustifiable demand on the part of Great Britain. Panama had granted in perpetuity the Canal Zone strip to the United States and all the rights, power, and authority with the territory granted as if the United States were sovereign. In return the United States guaranteed the independence of Panama and the right of free passage for its own vessels.

"It has always been supposed by this Government," said Secretary Knox, "that Great Britain recognized the propriety of the exemptions made in both of those treaties."

With propriety he could have stated the views of this Government much more emphatically. He could have recalled that in 1876 the United States made a commercial treaty with the King of the Hawaiian Islands; that there was then in existence a treaty between Great Britain and Hawaii containing the most-favored-nation clause; and that the British Government conceded the justice of the principle underlying the exemptions in the treaties with Colombia and Panama when it admitted that—as the advantages conceded to the United States by the Sandwich Islands are expressly stated to be given in consideration of and as an equivalent for certain reciprocal concessions on the part of the United States, Great Britain can not, as a matter of right, claim the same advantages for her trade under the strict letter of the treaty of 1851.

The Republic of Panama has no war vessels and it probably never will have any. If it were not for the guaranty of its independence by the United States its existence would be short lived. What purpose, then, could Great Britain have in protesting that the exemption of the vessels of Panama would make the charges upon ships unjust and inequitable? If Panama ever did indulge in the luxury of some gunboats or small armed vessels the amount of tolls from which they would be exempt would be so insignificant as to be practically impossible of calculation in the adjustment of the tolls upon other vessels. If Great Britain's claim rests upon no more substantial argument than this one it deserves little consideration; but if this be but the entering wedge of an additional argument to be advanced in favor of freedom from tolls for foreign war vessels as entitled to equality of treatment with war vessels of the United States and Panama it looms large, significant, and ominous. [Applause.]

I dismiss as of minor importance the wisdom or necessity of imposing tolls upon American vessels, because the revenue is required to maintain and operate the canal. It would be "straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel" to grow hysterical about revenues of $1,000,000 a year, to be applied to maintenance, after expending $400,000,000 for construction and defense. Graver, more important, and more far-reaching are the questions here involved. Believing that the American people are entitled to the fullest benefit from every standpoint because of their construction of the canal, and that such was the motive that induced our people to undertake the work, convinced of our right to exempt coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls for the use of the canal, and that such action was prompted by reasons of signal importance to the welfare and prosperity of our country, I am unable to support the pending bill.

If the question were merely one of expediency, or if I were in doubt as to the course to be followed and the reasons given for the action proposed were so persuasive as to command practically universal approval, I should gladly subordinate any personal opinion and acquiesce in the recommendation of the President.

But such is not the situation. I believe that the questions involved are fundamental and vitally affect our right to control our own affairs, and that they concern the material welfare of the country. Identified during years of service in this House with the enactment of legislation for the construction of the canal, I have acquired considerable information relative to its use. From this information I have formed opinions which have ripened into fixed and unalterable convictions. The reasons for them I have stated as convincingly as the allotted time would permit. I have no doubt as to the course I should follow, and I can not surrender to anyone, however much I admire and respect him, my deliberate and matured judgment upon a question of vital importance to the welfare of my country. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANDLER]. [Applause.]

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the repeal of the tolls-exemption clause of the Panama Canal act.

The President came before Congress a short while ago and made a request that created a political situation which, in my judgment, is the most critical that has confronted the American people since the cannon roar of Sumter shook the continent. No occupant of the presidential chair has ever advised a course of conduct that, in Mr. Wilson's finished phrase, "carried with it graver or more far-reaching implications to the interest of the country."

The message conveying the request was delivered within five minutes in 13 ominous sentences. Its brevity, considering its grave import, took the breath of Congress and stirred profoundly the whole Nation.

We were asked by the President to repeal the tolls-exemption clause of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912. We were asked, in effect, to discourage American shipping and further paralyze the American merchant marine by placing American coastwise vessels on the same footing of entrance charges as the vessels of other nations passing through the Panama Canal. We were asked to do this regardless of whether we were "right or wrong" at the time of the passage of the act.

In making this astonishing appeal, the Chief Executive of the Nation did not deign to enter into discussion or detail. He recited no history and quoted no poetry. He did not even pay the American Congress and the American people the scant courtesy of a mere suggestion that the request made was extraordinary, in view of the precipitate action to be taken in undoing the mighty work of the recent past. He did not stop to tell the world that the legislation to be repealed without due deliberation and without adequate controversy was the growth and consummation of years of enlightened public sentiment and of patriotic and prolonged congressional debate. He failed to call attention to the fact that during the growth of that public sentiment and during the heat of that congressional debate the best and wisest of the statesmen of our country—Democrats, Progressives, and Republicans—Wilson, Roosevelt, and Taft, men in the prime of physical and mental life, all statesmen of great ability and incorruptible integrity, approved the principle of free tolls and emphatically denied the charge that our national honor was involved in the matter of a breach of a treaty with Great Britain.

Again, in his message to the Congress, the President did not mention the fact that the question of free tolls was a distinct issue in the national political campaign of 1912; that the platforms of two great political parties, the Democratic and the Progressive, specifically demanded free tolls for American coastwise vessels; that the third great party, the Republican, was bound by the opinion of its candidate, Mr. Taft, who was then the country's President, that the act providing for free tolls, which he was afterwards soon to sign, did not violate the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; and, finally, the President did not state that more than 13,000,000 of American voters proclaimed by their ballots at the polls that the opinions of their statesmen and the demands of their party platforms were just and honorable. He utterly ignored all these things, and simply asked, with amazing frankness and childlike simplicity, that we grant his request upon the vague suggestion of impending danger to the country from abroad if we fail to do so.

I do not wish to transgress the rules of decorous congressional debate. I certainly do not intend to offend anyone who holds views upon this subject different from my own. But candor and my feelings compel me to declare that I believe that when the President delivered this message and made this request, in the form in which they came, he insulted, though unintentionally, both the American Congress and the American people. The insult to the Congress was wrapped up in the insult to the people, when he asked the Members of this House and of the Senate to join with him in an act destructive of freedom and free institutions among men, because done in open defiance of the electorate and in cynical disregard of the final judgment of the people at the polls. And when he did this, considering that the power of his position converts every request into a command, he virtually proclaimed a personal and imperial government on this continent against which the patriots of the Revolution successfully contended, and against which the freedom and progress of the twentieth century protest.

I am bitterly opposed to the repeal measure under consideration. I want it understood, however, that no unfriendliness toward Great Britain is implied in this attitude of opposition. Neither Anglomania nor Anglophobia molds my judgment in the matter.

I repudiate with scorn the statement alleged to have been made recently by Mr. Page, our ambassador to England, that we are "English led and English ruled." Nevertheless, it may be truthfully said that, though now politically separated for more than a hundred years, we are still bound by many tender and sacred ties to the motherland. From England came our language, our literature, and our laws. From Britain, as from a great fountainhead, flowed our blood, our civilization, our most sacred national traditions, and the proudest memories of our race.

These considerations should not blind us, however, to the shortcomings and wrongdoings of the British people, nor make us forgetful of our duty to our own country and its highest interests. For the England of the Crusades, of Magna Charta and the Bill of Rights, of Shakespeare, Pitt, and Nelson, of Wellington and the squares at Waterloo, I have unbounded admiration and supreme affection; but for the England of commerce, of selfish and mercenary motives, of broken pledges and bad faith in Egypt, of Irish and East Indian oppression, I have neither sympathy nor respect.

I want it further understood that my opposition to the repeal of this measure is not based upon any personal or political hostility to the Democratic President of the Republic or to the Democratic Party now in control of the Government. I have voted with Democrats upon important party measures, and I have gladly supported bills embodying the pet political notions of the President.

For Woodrow Wilson, the man, the author of The State and of The History of the American People, the former president of Princeton University, the former governor of New Jersey, the present President of the United States, I have only the kindliest feelings and the sincerest personal regards. Political differences aside, the clean character and lofty life, the intellectual achievements and political triumphs of the man in the White House entitle him to the respect and admiration of his countrymen everywhere. But when I have said these things eulogy must cease and rigid criticism must begin.

Mr. Speaker, the chief trouble with this whole controversy, as I see it, is that it divides the population of the United States into two parts—President Wilson and the balance of us. In the language of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, this division does not seem to me to be exactly "just and equitable." If the President would kindly consent to take some of us into his confidence and let us know just a little and say just a word about our own affairs, I for one would like and esteem him better. All the people of America are standing on tiptoe and looking with strained eyes at this Democratic show in Washington, and as a show it is the very best ever, but a good many people are disappointed at seeing one man playing all the parts.

The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] stated in his speech the other day that the opponents of the President in this matter are forced to question either his veracity or his judgment. Not necessarily so. Such logic would strangle all debate. Besides, the alternatives of the gentleman from Pennsylvania did not extend far enough. We may question either the veracity or the judgment or the courage of the President, and I am here to tell the gentleman from Pennsylvania that it is our right and privilege as free and untrammeled American Representatives and, in a sense, our duty to question any or all of them, even if Mr. Wilson is the President of the United States.

I for one do not question his veracity, although in reading his biography I find nowhere an account of any hatchet experiences of cherry-tree adventures in his early youth. I for one do question both his judgment and his courage, and I do not feel that I am in the least ungenerous toward the President, for his conduct in this matter amply justifies the suspicion that he has either deceived us or that his judgment has been paralyzed by fright. Such a thing is certainly mentally and psychologically possible. You have often heard it said of a certain man that he was "frightened out of his wits." It is only necessary to hold a pistol to a man's head at midday, and tell him that it is midnight, to make him swear that he sees stars.

Now, what nation, whether England or Mexico, has frightened the President, I do not know. But I do know that there is no necessity for fear from either one or both of them. We have played certain little international rôles with both of them in history, and we have no reason to be ashamed of the result; and we were weaker then than we are now. We had some trouble with England in 1776, and George Washington and Paul Jones arranged the matter finally to our entire satisfaction. We had a little bout with her again in 1812, and Andrew Jackson wound up the day for us quite gloriously. Again, later, in the Venezuelan controversy, she made a threat. Grover Cleveland, a rugged Democrat, with brave and honest heart, called her hand, and the bluff was over, and she retreated to her little island across the sea.

I can not conceive that the President has been frightened by Mexico alone. We have floated the Stars and Stripes above the palace of the Montezumas once, and we could very easily do it again, and in a very few weeks, if called upon to do so.

My esteemed friend from Texas [Mr. HENRY] in his opening speech compared Wilson with Jackson. The comparison is perfect upon a basis of absolute antithesis. They are so strikingly unalike that we always think of one when the other is mentioned, on the principle that we always have the North Pole in mind when we think of the South Pole.

I do not know whether England has threatened the President or not. But I do know and the world knows what would happen if Jackson were in the White House to-day and a threat came from England. Instead of sending a message to Congress advising that we knuckle and yield the point to England, he would advise that we make an immediate appropriation to enlarge the standing Army and to increase the Navy with a hundred additional battleships.

I object to the passage of this bill, because I believe that a political platform is a covenant with the people, a sacred thing, to be loyally observed and faithfully executed by every representative of the people who stood upon it when elected. The Progressive national platform, adopted at Chicago on August 7, 1912, contained the following provision:

> The Panama Canal, built and paid for by the American people, must be used primarily for their benefit. We demand that the canal shall be so operated as to break transportation monopoly, now held and misused by the transcontinental railroads, by maintaining sea competition with them; that ships directly or indirectly owned or controlled by American railroad corporations shall not be permitted to use the canal, and that American ships engaged in coastwise trade shall pay no tolls.

I was elected upon the Progressive national platform, and the most solemn official obligation rests upon me to observe its provisions in letter and in spirit.

The platform of the national Democratic Party, adopted at Baltimore on July 2, 1912, contained the following declaration:

> We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal. We also favor legislation forbidding the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned or controlled by railroad carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal.

I am not of the Democratic faith, but several thousand of my constituents are, and a binding obligation rests upon me to represent them, too, by a negative vote on the passage of this bill, since their party platform declaration is the same as that of mine. I feel obligated to do this all the more keenly since the Democratic ship has been deserted by its captain and is now drifting helplessly in dangerous and unknown seas. Finding this particular plank of the Democratic platform a helpless orphan upon my political doorsteps, the common sentiments of humanity compel me to take it in and care for it.

More than once in private conversation with Members of this House I have heard it asserted that the people were ignorant of these platform declarations and did not have them in mind when they voted. Such statements are always made in derision of party platforms and in mockery of the electorate. They are unworthy of faithful public servants and should never be uttered, even in private.

What is certain beyond doubt is that the press of the country discussed these planks in the party platforms, and that political campaigners frequently referred to them. We should treat the people with the decent courtesy and respect to suppose that they read the papers, and that they sometimes listen to the orators, and that, having read and heard, they are sufficiently intelligent to comprehend.

The chief curse of American politics has been the faithlessness of recreant public servants who forgot after election their promises and platform pledges made before election. This phase of public life has more than any other irritated and disgusted the American people with their system of government and its administration. And, with all due respect to your feelings, if you pass this bill, every political rascal of the future will find in the action of this day a precedent, a consolation, and an excuse for broken party pledges and faithless public service. Every little political delinquent in days to come will seek to justify his treachery to the people by pointing to the example of President Wilson and the Democratic Congress in 1914.

Again, I am opposed to the repeal of the tolls exemption clause of the canal act because the greatest and most illustrious of the statesmen of our day and time not more than 18 months ago, when their minds were free from timid fear and selfish purpose, favored free tolls for American coastwise vessels passing through the Panama Canal. Let me introduce at this point their expert testimony.

During the last national campaign, at Washington Park, N. J., on August 15, 1912, President Wilson, then a candidate, said:

> One of the great objects in cutting that great ditch across the Isthmus of Panama is to allow farmers who are near the Atlantic to ship to the Pacific by way of the Atlantic ports, to allow all the farmers on what I may, standing here, call this part of the continent, to find an outlet at ports of the Gulf or the ports of the Atlantic seaboard, and then have coastwise steamers carry their products down around through the canal and up the Pacific coast or down the coast of South America.
> Now, at present there are no ships to do that, and one of the bills pending—passed, I believe, yesterday by the Senate as it had passed the House—provides for free tolls for American ships through that canal and prohibits any ship from passing through which is owned by any American railroad company. You see the object of that, don't you? [Applause.] We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage to compete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent. * * *
> Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means business. It means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest and honest men, who intend to do business along those lines and who are not willing to see whether they can catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not.

They know the American people are taking notice in a way which they never took notice before, and gentlemen who talk one way and vote another are going to be retired to a very quiet and private retreat.

I wonder what "very quiet and private retreat" the President intends to seek when a disappointed and disgusted people, remembering this speech, retire him from office two years from now, because he used his platform pledges in the matter of free tolls for American coastwise ships to secure their votes as a housewife would use "molasses to catch flies."

The pity of the matter is that the President was certainly right at Washington Park, N. J., in 1912 and is absolutely wrong at Washington, D. C., in 1914. No finer argument for the building of the canal and for free tolls for American coastwise ships was ever offered than that made by Mr. Wilson in New Jersey when he was a candidate for the Presidency. His logical argument, his fine language, and his patriotic utterance carried conviction to his hearers and called forth round after round of loud applause.

His appeal for loyalty to party platforms was manly and patriotic. He indirectly invoked public wrath upon the men who attempt to deceive the people by talking one way before election and voting another after election. In branding such men with infamy he invented a phrase, "molasses to catch flies," which will remain historic and permanent in American political literature as an expression of derision and contempt for the conduct of base betrayers of public confidence.

The difficulty with the President and with his party is that this is no isolated case of platform smashing. The trouble seems to be growing systematic and chronic. Violating platform pledges will soon be recognized as a normal state of the Democratic mind, a characteristic feature of Democratic performance.

The debates over the Cullop amendment to the Palmer bill providing for the appointment of an additional judge for the eastern district of Pennsylvania are still fresh in our minds. We remember distinctly how the Progressive and Republican minorities joined hands with a few conscientious Democrats in an attempt to establish a healthy principle in legislation by compelling the publication of the names of indorsers of appointees to the Federal courts. We remember how desperately this amendment was fought by the Democratic majority, although the principle involved in the passage of the amendment was in absolute harmony with a plank in the national Democratic platform.

On October 22, 1913, President Wilson signed the urgent deficiency bill, a provision of which exempted deputy marshals and internal-revenue collectors from the operation of the civil-service rules and regulations. When he did this he shattered another plank in the Democratic national platform, the one relating to civil-service reform.

The country is beginning to ask what it all means. The people are already beginning to suspect that their President is not a Puritan in political virtue. A few more broken platform pledges and suspicion will grow into confidence that they have in the White House not a statesman of the brand of Jackson, but an opportunist of the type of Machiavelli.

At this point I must quote an extract on the sacredness of party platform pledges from an address by Hon. William J. Bryan, our present distinguished Secretary of State, before the House of Representatives of Pennsylvania on May 13, 1913. This, let it be remembered, was subsequent to the Baltimore convention and the election of Mr. Wilson to the Presidency. On that occasion Mr. Bryan spoke as follows:

The fact that we not only have platforms, but that the platform is becoming more specified year after year, is conclusive proof that the people believe in the Democratic theory, and they write their platforms because they believe, and those who run upon them lead the voters to believe, that they believe a platform is binding upon those who stand upon it.

As a believer in the Democratic theory of representative government I desire to announce it as a settled principle not to be questioned in this country that a platform is binding upon every honest man who runs upon that platform. I have heard it said by men after an election that they could not conscientiously support something in their platform, and it raises a very important question whether a man should violate his conscience as a public servant, and I frankly tell you that I believe that no man should violate his conscience, either as an individual or as a public servant. Far be it from me to say that any man elected to any office should as an official do a thing that his conscience condemns. But does that mean that he should violate his platform? No; it seems that his conscience should commence to work before the election and not hibernate until after the election.

I lay it down as a proposition and I am prepared to defend it anywhere, that the representative who secures office upon a platform and then holds the office and betrays the people who elected him is a criminal worse than the man who embezzled money intrusted to him.

If it be objected that this was the private opinion of Mr. Bryan and is not binding upon any Democratic Member of this House, then let me read the following deeply significant words in the concluding paragraph of the last Democratic national platform:

Our pledges are made to be kept when in office as well as relied upon during the campaign.

In view of what President Wilson said at Washington Park, of what Mr. Bryan said before the Pennsylvania House of Representatives, and of what the Democratic national platform proclaimed at Baltimore in regard to the sacredness of party platforms, what are we to think of the proceedings of this day in the American Congress? Would it not be interesting to hear a private conversation between President Wilson and Secretary Bryan at the White House concerning all these things? Would you not expect to hear Mr. Bryan tell Mr. Wilson that he was "a criminal worse than the man who embezzled money intrusted to him," because he had secured the votes of the people by promises of free tolls for American coastwise ships and had then betrayed them?

The fact is that this whole proceeding is a sickening exhibition of political blundering and hypocrisy that has few parallels in the political history of this or any other country.

Let us turn now again to the consideration of the question of the meaning and interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in relation to the passage of this bill. Let us consider the expert testimony of another great American statesman, President Taft, in a special message to Congress on August 19, 1912, after England's protest against free tolls for American ships, said:

After full examination of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and of the treaty which preceded it I feel confident that the exemption of the coastwise vessels of the United States from tolls and the imposition of tolls on vessels of all nations engaged in the foreign trade is not a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Whatever may be his weaknesses otherwise, no fair-minded man will say that Mr. Taft is not a great lawyer. His opinion, for this reason, is very valuable, indeed. Moreover, it is worthy of note that Mr. Taft has not changed his opinion since. At New Haven a few days ago, being questioned upon the subject, Mr. Taft replied:

I am reluctant to take any part in this controversy, but I expressed my opinion on the matter of canal tolls in an official memorandum attached to the Panama Canal act, and I have seen no reason to change my views there expressed.

Now, last but not least, let us consider the third great expert witness, an incomparable statesman, with the finest political intellect in the Republic. In the Outlook of the issue of January 18, 1913, ex-President Roosevelt said:

I believe that the position of the United States is proper as regards this coastwise traffic. I think that we have the right to free bona fide coastwise traffic from tolls. I think that this does not interfere with the rights of any other nation, because no ships but our own can engage in coastwise traffic, so that there is no discrimination against other ships when we relieve the coastwise traffic from tolls. I believe that the only damage that would be done is the damage to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Moreover, I do not think that it sits well on the representatives of any foreign nation, even upon those of a power with which we are, and I hope and believe will always remain, on such good terms as Great Britain, to make any plea in reference to what we do with our own coastwise traffic, because we are benefiting the whole world by our action at Panama, and are doing this where every dollar of expense is paid by ourselves. In all history I do not believe you can find another instance where as great and expensive a work as the Panama Canal, undertaken not by a private corporation but by a nation, has ever been as generously put at the service of all the nations of mankind.

The great men who expressed these opinions, at once so entertaining, instructive, and fascinating, were all candidates of political parties, all leaders of political thought, and all occupied high places in the affections of their fellow citizens and in the councils of the Nation. But when we have read about and have deeply meditated upon what these celebrated men said and did concerning free tolls, certain curious reflections, half serious, half humorous, rush upon the mind with resistless force. Did these men know or not that exemption of American coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls would be a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty? If they did not know, why did they not know? Were not all the facts and all the law relating to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and to the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, before them then that we have now? Have we discovered a single fact or a single rule of law affecting the merits of the free-tolls controversy of the national campaign of 1912 since that was not present to the minds of Wilson, Roosevelt, and Taft when they committed themselves so unconditionally to the advocacy of free tolls? If not, and if the present contention of the President is correct, it is impossible to explain the density of the mental haze or the extent of the moral obliquity that must have afflicted them at the time, rendering them incapable of discerning the right or, knowing it, dulling and destroying their moral perceptions, until they failed to see the national dishonor into which they were leading us as a Nation by their advice and conduct.

My opposition to the repeal of the toll-exemption clause of the Panama Canal act rests, however, upon a still firmer foundation than any consideration of party platforms or the opinions of great men. I oppose the repeal because more than 13,000,000 of American voters, prompted by the highest patriotic motives, keenly alert to their own and the Nation's interests, in possession of a complete record of fact, with their party platforms in front of them, acting upon the advice of their best and wisest statesmen, with every phase of the discussion familiar to them, and with the voices of the orators and the thunderings of the press still ringing in their ears, deliberately marched to the polls in November, 1912, and declared emphatically and overwhelmingly in favor of free tolls for American coastwise vessels passing through the Panama Canal. That judgment still stands, and should be considered sacred and inviolable by every lover of liberty and every friend of republican government until it is reversed by the only power that can reverse it, the people themselves. He who questions the validity or the righteousness of that judgment questions the capacity of the American people for self-government. He who would review, revise, and reject that judgment without the consent of the people, and without first giving them a chance to review, revise, and reject it themselves, is a stranger to the high and holy obligations that should rest forever upon the hearts and consciences of American representatives.

The contemptuous defiance, the cynical mocking of the will of the people, deliberately and solemnly expressed at the polls, the bold and brazen attempt at usurpation by the President of the functions of the Congress, and by both the President and the Congress of the rights and privileges of the electorate, is the appalling feature of this controversy. The whole proceeding is in a sense a treasonable transaction, because it virtually insults and assaults the will, the intelligence, the dignity, and the majesty of the people themselves, the only sovereign power known to a Republic.

Another ugly feature of the situation is the dominating attitude, the ex cathedra, schoolmaster style of the President, who doubtless unconsciously imported it from Princeton to Washington. Another worse feature still than the attitude of the President is the cringing servility on the part of many Members of this House who are willing to abrogate their functions as Congressmen to please the President, although they know that his request is in direct defiance of the will of the people as it was last declared and registered at the polls.

The great question, then, before the Congress is not whether we have broken a treaty with Great Britain and thereby impaired the national honor, but whether we have violated our own national traditions, assaulted our own Constitution, and wounded the spirit of our own laws by assuming to act without jurisdiction in a case where the people have already definitely and finally spoken.

The great danger to the country in the proposal of the President is not that we shall lose the esteem of England and the world, through national dishonor by breach of treaty, but that we shall destroy the Republic and representative government by poisoning the heart of popular sovereignty and by ignoring those checks and balances which are the distinctive features of our free institutions, and that were devised by the founders of the Republic as a means of perpetuating the Constitution.

I trust that you will pardon me for a momentary digression along lines of historical reflection. The Constitutional Convention, which met at Philadelphia in 1787, was the ablest body of jurists, patriots, and statesmen that ever convened on this or any other continent. Hamilton, of New York, was there; Adams, of Massachusetts, was there; Franklin, of Pennsylvania, was there; Madison and Henry, of Virginia, were there; and George Washington presided over the convention. The annals of the human race record the proceedings of no deliberative body that equaled them in wisdom, sagacity, and patriotism. The history of the human race was before the members of this convention for inspiration and instruction. Democratic government had been a stupendous failure. Republican institutions had almost vanished from the earth. Single, unchecked assemblies had swept the ancient republics from the world. To the fathers gathered in the City of Brotherly Love was committed the task of building a government that would stand the shock of time. They gave to mankind the American Constitution, the best and noblest product of human wisdom, a perfect crystallization of those maxims of liberty and law that in every age have been found to be both generous and just. They said, we will have an independent Congress, an independent Executive, an independent judiciary. Each shall be a check upon the encroachments of the others. Each shall be at once an anchor and a bulwark of both law and freedom. Then, should some demagogue like Cleon, the Greek, appear in the House of Representatives, a firm and independent Senate will hold him in check. Should the Senate itself be cursed by the presence of a Catiline, as was the case with the Roman Senate, liberty-loving Representatives, elected every two years fresh from the bosom of the people, will destroy his plans. Should some man like Aaron Burr mount to the presidential chair, and, designing the destruction of the liberties of his country, aspire to imperial purple as Burr did, then a firm and independent Senate and House combined will crush his criminal ambition. Should the Senate, the House, and the President enter into some despotic and diabolical design, then an independent, august court, clothed with absolute judicial authority, will stand forever between despotism and the liberties of mankind.

Thus, reasoned the fathers, the Republic will endure forever and the welfare of the country be forever safe under a threefold form of government—legislative, executive, and judicial—each dependent yet a check upon the others, all resting upon the affections of the people, each subject to the jealous scrutiny of the public eye, and all forming a grand shield for the protection of the liberties of men and for the security of free institutions on the earth.

The Constitution having been thus established and ordained by the duly accredited representatives of the people gathered at Philadelphia, having received the approval of Madison, the sanction of Hamilton, the prayers of Franklin, and the benediction of Washington, its framers presented it as a priceless political heritage to the human race. And as a key and guide to the interpretation and construction of this the Nation's fundamental law the fathers bequeathed the Declaration of Independence, the best and noblest, the serenest and sublimest enunciation of human rights, and the bitterest and fiercest denunciation of despotic claims in the annals of the world.

The Continentals of Washington, who made the Republic possible, loved and revered this Constitution. They believed that it was more than the product of calm wisdom and lofty patriotism. They believed that it possessed a distinctively providential element. They felt that it was God's saving gift to a distracted and imperiled people; that it was His creative fiat over a weltering chaos, when he said: "Let a nation be born in a day." And when we look backward across the stretch of a splendid and majestic century, we behold the children of the great Republic, blessed of heaven and guided by the finger of God, moving peacefully onward to a marvelous and magnificent destiny.

The founders of the Republic designed the Constitution to be perpetual, the generations that followed proclaimed it an immortal document, and it is our sacred and solemn duty to transmit it untarnished and undiminished in beauty and in strength to all the generations that come after us. Any assault upon it should be accounted an accursed act. He who would despoil it should be execrated as we would loathe the profaner of a temple or the desecrater of a shrine.

I intend no schoolboy declamation by this outburst. I detest the methods of the alarmist and the incendiary. But I would be false to my platform pledges to the people, to my oath of office as a Congressman, and to my conscience as a man if I did not protest in vigorous terms against what I believe to be an appalling danger to my country and a dastardly assault upon the rights and privileges of my countrymen.

If President Wilson can dominate the Congress by a mere request, based upon vague suggestion and wrapped in mystery and doubt; if the Congress is cowardly and obsequious enough to be thus dominated by the President, without rhyme or reason, then the Republic of the fathers is at an end. If the collective judgment of the people at the polls upon any great issue of national moment can be set aside at the mere suggestion of a single man, however righteous his motive, great his talent, or high his place, then this is no longer "a government of the people, by the people, and for the people." It is a beneficent despotism, a monarchy veiled under republican forms.

The serious aspect of this controversy is local, not foreign; national, not international. Our first duty is to our own countrymen, not to Englishmen. Better a thousand times lose the respect of the world than to lose our self-respect. We can live down a broken treaty, as England has lived down a dozen broken treaties, but we can not survive a fatal assault upon the vitals of our own national life.

But, say the gentlemen of the opposition, we were wrong when we passed the Panama Canal act of 1912. The people were wrong when they voted for free tolls at the polls in 1912. Being wrong, as a Congress and as a people, we should retrace our steps and get right. Of course we should if we were wrong. Honor to a nation is what virtue is to a woman or fragrance to a flower. But who is to determine whether we were right or wrong? Is it not true that the question is at least a mooted one? Shall the President decide it in his present state of mind? With Sir Edward Grey and Huerta harassing his days and disturbing his sleep at night, is he capable of forming a just opinion with respect to what is right and what is wrong? Shall the Congress decide the question? Is it not a fact that the patronage of the President has already paralyzed the brain and stifled the conscience of two-thirds of the Democrats of this House, until they have been stripped of every vestige of legislative initiative and intellectual independence worthy of the name? Are they to be chosen as the fearless and unbiased arbiters of a people's rights and a nation's honor?

It affords me pleasure, however, to testify before the world to the splendid courage and lofty patriotism of many Democrats in this House—men like CLARK, UNDERWOOD, and FITZGERALD—who love their country better than their party and are more than willing to sacrifice all the traditions of party politics to realize the highest good for the Commonwealth. The thanks of the Republic are due these men, who have set a fine example of party sacrifice and public service.

My contention, in brief, is this: That if our country is wrong in this controversy, it is for the people to reverse themselves. I deny that Congress or the President has the right to do it for them. I concede that Congress has the constitutional power to repeal Federal laws. I deny that in this instance Congress has the moral right to do so. If it be contended that no adequate method is provided by our political machinery to enable the people to reverse themselves, then I insist that their judgment shall be final and eternal.

Four solutions of the controversy, other than action by Congress, have been proposed:

First. Diplomatic negotiations which may lead to mutual concessions and an amicable settlement.

Second. Arbitration before the Permanent Court of Arbitration at The Hague.

Third. Arbitration before a commission or court composed solely of American and British subjects.

Fourth. Submission of the controverted questions to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The first method offers some hope of settlement. The other three are practically impossible. Sir Edward Grey, in making the British protest, suggested submission of the question to The Hague tribunal. The injustice of this proposal consists in the fact that the court would be prejudiced against us before the beginning of the argument. The majority of the judges of The Hague peace tribunal are representatives of European nations whose interests are identical with those of England in this controversy, as far as international sympathy is concerned. It is not a question of difference between two individual nations over local interests involved. It is a question of world-wide interest in which the jury would be packed against us. As well ask Britons themselves to decide the question as to refer it to The Hague tribunal.

Aside from the question of interest, we are not called upon or expected, as a matter of honor, to submit the question to international arbitration. We would compromise a distinctive national policy if we did. The representatives of the United States signed the convention of 1899 for the arbitration of international disputes, subject to a distinct reservation, which is as follows:

> Nothing contained in this convention shall be so construed as to require the United States of America to depart from its traditional policy of not entering upon, interfering with, or entangling itself in the political questions of policy or internal administration of any foreign State; nor shall anything contained in the said convention be construed to imply a relinquishment by the United States of America of its traditional attitude toward purely American questions.

By the Hay-Bunau Varilla treaty of 1903 the Republic of Panama sold the Panama Canal Zone strip of land to the United States. The United States, by the very terms of the treaty itself, acquired absolute ownership and possession, and in terms of sovereignty. In other words, we own the property absolutely and our sovereignty over it is unlimited, from the mere viewpoint of property rights. If the question were submitted to The Hague tribunal and the decision were against us, the necessary result would be the creation of an Anglo-American canal policy instead of a strictly American policy in the Western Hemisphere. This would violate the principle of the Monroe doctrine and would "imply a relinquishment by the United States of America of its traditional attitude toward purely American questions."

It is urged, however, that we are in honor bound to submit the matter to arbitration in conformity with one of the terms of our treaty with Great Britain of April 4, 1908. One of the provisions of that treaty runs as follows:

> Differences which may arise of a legal nature or relating to the interpretation of treaties existing between the two contracting parties, and which it may not have been possible to settle by diplomacy, shall be referred to the permanent court of arbitration established at The Hague by the convention of the 29th of July, 1899, provided, nevertheless, that they do not affect the vital interests, the independence, or the honor of the two contracting States and do not concern the interests of third parties.

By the plain terms of the language of the treaty just quoted we are not bound or called upon to submit the present controversy to arbitration. Our "vital interests" and our "traditional policy" are both deeply concerned. The "interests of third parties" are also directly concerned, for, aside from the immediate interests that the nations of the world have in the outcome of the controversy, the Republic of Panama is a directly interested third party. If The Hague tribunal should decide against free tolls for American coastwise vessels, we would be compelled, in obedience to the decision, to require payment of tolls of the vessels of the Republic of Panama, which are now exempted from payment of tolls by treaty with us.

From no viewpoint, as far as I can see, are we obligated to submit the question to arbitration. The United States and England should and must settle their own difficulty. The President demands that settlement shall be made by immediate and unconditional surrender by the United States to the demands of England. I am bitterly opposed to this.

Up to this point in my remarks I have denied the moral jurisdiction of the President and the Congress to repeal the tolls-exemption clause of the Panama Canal act of 1912. I have based my denial upon the simple proposition that the judgment of the people in a free republic is fundamental and final, and should not be disturbed by any other agency within the Government.

I propose now to affirm and argue briefly the justice and validity of the American side of the contention. For purposes of argument I thus tacitly admit the jurisdiction of the Congress to act in the present case, but deny that from any point of view it is right or necessary to pass the pending bill. The remainder of my speech will be devoted to the establishment of two points:

First. That the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is no longer binding upon the United States, being voidable but not void.

Second. That the United States would not be morally justified in repudiating the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in toto, but is both legally and morally justified in interpreting said treaty in such a way as to exempt American coastwise vessels from payment of tolls in passing through the Panama Canal.

That the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is no longer binding upon the United States rests upon a well-known rule of international law, that all treaties are abrogated by implication whenever the essential condition and the state of things which formed the basis of the treaty at the time of making have ceased to exist. The rule that all treaties are made upon the tacit condition rebus sic stantibus is as well established as any known to the law of nations. The following eminent authorities may be quoted upon the point.

In his work on international law Mr. Hall says:

> Neither party to the treaty can make its binding effect dependent at his will upon conditions other than those contemplated at the moment when the contract was entered into; and, on the other hand, a contract ceases to be binding as soon as anything which formed an implied condition of its obligatory force at the time of its conclusion is essentially altered.

In his work, entitled "A Treatise on International Public Law," Mr. Hannis Taylor says:

> So unstable are the conditions of international existence, and so difficult is it to enforce a contract between States after the state of facts upon which it was founded has substantially changed, that all such agreements are necessarily made subject to the general understanding that they shall cease to be obligatory so soon as the conditions upon which they were executed are essentially changed.

Mr. Oppenheim, writing upon the same subject, says:

> It is an almost universally recognized fact that vital changes of circumstances may be of such a kind as to justify a party in notifying an unnotifiable treaty. The vast majority of publicists, as well as all the Governments of the members of the family of nations, agree that all treaties are concluded under the tacit condition rebus sic stantibus.

The application of this rule of international law to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty will render it voidable at the option of the United States. This treaty was made with the paramount purpose in view that the canal should be constructed by the United States on foreign territory. It was never for a moment supposed or contemplated by either of the high contracting parties that the canal would be finally constructed upon territory owned by the United States. The fact that the United States became the absolute owner of the territory through which the canal was built after the treaty was signed is a fundamental consideration affecting the controversy in view of the rule of international law heretofore quoted. The treaty was concluded on the supposition that the United States would build the canal on alien territory, and this assumption was a fundamental fact in the making of the treaty. The United States afterwards bought a strip of territory and built its own canal. This unexpected change virtually abrogated the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and made its provisions of no effect, because one of the essential conditions at the bottom of its making failed to become effective.

The opponents of this contention quote article 4 of the treaty, which is as follows:

It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

A surface reading of this language seems to destroy the force of the contention that I make. But a careful reading of the entire treaty in connection with the Bulwer-Clayton treaty, and with the diplomatic correspondence that accompanied both, shows conclusively that the purchase of territory by the United States for the purpose of building a canal, with an accompanying "change of territorial sovereignty," was never contemplated remotely by either of the contracting parties.

Article 4 of the treaty was evidently inserted to guard against the baneful effects of Spanish Central American revolutions that sweep over the earth with terrifying and devastating frequency. It had no application to a contemplated change of territorial sovereignty as the result of a purchase of territory by the United States.

The indefinite language used in the preliminary paragraph of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty supports my contention. No particular route was in contemplation of the contracting parties at the time. It was intended to construct "a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route might (may) be considered expedient." It was "under the auspices," not on the territory, of the United States that the canal was to be constructed.

It was purely and strangely a fortuitous circumstance that caused the United States to buy the Canal Zone strip of land at all. After the ratification by the Senate of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, President Roosevelt, in a message to Congress, recommended the adoption of the Panama route for the construction of the canal. He further recommended the purchase of all French rights for $40,000,000. The plan proposed by the President was adopted by the Congress, and an appropriation of $170,000,000 was made with a view to the construction of the canal over the Panama route, provided the consent of Colombia could be obtained. The President was directed to construct the canal over the Nicaragua route, if the consent of Colombia could not be obtained, at a cost not to exceed $180,000,000.

In pursuance of this understanding the United States negotiated the Hay-Herran treaty with Colombia. By the terms of this treaty, Colombia was to grant to the United States the desired right of way in consideration of $10,000,000 and an annuity of $250,000. The treaty was concluded, signed by the duly accredited representatives of the contracting parties, and was ratified by the Senate of the United States on March 17, 1903. The Colombian Government, however, refused to ratify the terms of the treaty as they had been agreed upon by its representatives, but intimated that it would consent to the ratification if $25,000,000 were paid. The United States refused to respect this demand, and the proposed treaty failed of ratification. This action of the Government of Colombia enraged the people of the State of Panama, who felt that their commercial interests would have been immensely benefited by the building of the canal. The bitterness finally became so intense that the people of Panama revolted and declared their independence. Roosevelt, remembering the treachery of Colombia, and acting with the genius and intrepidity that characterized his every act of statesmanship, adopted a course of conduct that resulted in securing the desired grant of territory from Panama.

The price paid was (1) a guaranty by the United States of the perpetual independence of Panama; (2) a fixed sum of $10,000,000; and (3) an annual payment after nine years of $250,000.

The grant was made in the following language:

The Republic of Panama grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of a zone of land and land under water for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of said canal of the width of 10 miles, extending to the distance of 5 miles on each side of the center line of the route of the canal to be constructed; the said zone beginning in the Caribbean Sea 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark and extending to and across the Isthmus of Panama into the Pacific Ocean to a distance of 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark.

To the property right thus granted in perpetuity were superadded political rights of sovereignty in the following language, from article 3 of the same document, known as the Hay-Bunau Varilla treaty:

The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the rights, power, and authority within the zone mentioned * * * which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority.

It is respectfully submitted that the combined grants of property rights in perpetuity and of political sovereignty without limit contained in the terms of the aforesaid treaty made the United States the absolute owner of the Canal Zone territory.

And yet the distinguished senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], in his celebrated speech in the United States Senate on January 21, 1913, said of the Canal Zone:

It is not our territory, except in trust.

Opposed to this view is the opinion of Mr. Justice Brewer, late of the Supreme Court of the United States, who—decided that such a grant necessarily carried the fee title, as it entirely excluded the rights, present or reversionary, of any other proprietor.

Those who consider that the admission that the United States is the absolute owner of the Canal Zone territory is fatal, seek to avoid the consequences by another kind of ingenious argument. They assert that the United States can not constitutionally acquire foreign territory, reviving a contention vehemently made in the national campaign of 1900 in connection with the acquisition of the Philippine Islands. But here again the highest legal authority is against them. Chief Justice Marshall, advising Mr. Jefferson in regard to the Louisiana purchase, said:

The Constitution confers absolutely upon the Government of the Union the powers of making war and of making treaties; consequently that Government possesses the power of acquiring territory either by conquest or by treaty.

Then these questions naturally suggest themselves to the mind: Did the United States, the purchaser, have the constitutional right to buy the Canal Zone? Yes; Chief Justice Marshall, speaking through a hundred years, has said so. Did the Republic of Panama, the seller, have the legal right to sell? Yes; the Republic of Panama was a sovereign State, whose independence had been recognized by the United States and by Great Britain, the parties to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Did the seller aforesaid actually sell to the purchaser aforesaid? Yes. What was the nature of the transfer? The character of the transfer was of "the use, occupation, and control of a zone of land and land under water in perpetuity," coupled with a grant of unlimited political sovereignty. Did this grant necessarily carry the fee title? Yes; Justice Brewer has said so. What is the effect, then, of the absolute ownership by the United States of the canal and the Canal Zone upon the question of the voidability of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and the present right of the United States to reject it? Considering that the United States acquired the Panama Canal property subsequent to the signing of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and that the building of the canal by the United States upon her own property instead of upon alien territory was an unforeseen event, the happening of which caused a fundamental change in one of the essential conditions upon which said treaty was based, according to a well-established principle of international law the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is impliedly abrogated, and the United States may give notice to Great Britain at any time that she refuses further to be bound by it.

This brings me to a consideration of the second proposition heretofore announced, that the United States, though legally permitted to do so, would not be morally justified in repudiating the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in toto, but is both legally and morally justified in interpreting said treaty in such a way as to exempt American coastwise vessels from payment of tolls in passing through the Panama Canal. In seeking to establish this proposition I shall of necessity be compelled, on account of limited time, to confine myself to a few simple definitions and brief observations touching the cardinal features of the controversy.

First. In construing the Hay-Pauncefote treaty it will be well to keep in mind the first rule of interpretation of treaties thus laid down by an eminent British authority on international law:

When the language of a treaty, taken in the ordinary meaning of the words, yields a plain and reasonable sense, it must be taken as intended to be read in that sense, subject to the qualifications that any words which may have a customary meaning in treaties differing from their common signification must be understood to have that meaning.

In connection with this fundamental rule of interpretation, the following two points must be further considered in this connection:

(1) That a presumption of absolute good faith in the observance of a treaty must be allowed in favor of any nation against which a charge of treaty violation is brought.

(2) That, a treaty being an international contract, national and domestic subjects are beyond its scope; that a strong presumption exists against the interpretation that any party to a treaty has relinquished any portion of its sovereignty or has delegated to the other party or parties any control or dominion over its domestic affairs; and that if there has been any relinquishment of sovereignty or delegation of control over domestic affairs by one nation to another, it must appear from the plain terms of the treaty, by clear and specific language, that such was the intention.

Second. The battle ground of the present conflict is pitched upon rule 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which reads as follows:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

A proper analysis of the language of this rule, in the light of the present controversy, involves a consideration of the following questions:

(1) Does the phrase "all nations observing these rules" include or exclude the United States?

(2) Does the phrase "vessels of commerce" include coastwise vessels of the United States in the matter of the application of the language of the treaty?

(3) Does the exemption of American coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls constitute such a discrimination against the vessels of other nations as is forbidden by the treaty?

Third. In seeking to determine whether the phrase "all nations" includes or excludes the United States, the use of the word "adopts," in the opening paragraph of article 3, is a valuable key to proper interpretation. This language is used:

> The United States adopts * * * the following rules.

The use of the word "adopts" clearly indicates ownership and suggests unmistakably that the owner of the canal is prescribing terms and conditions upon which other nations may use that canal.

Again, it must be remembered that the canal is not free to the vessels of all nations, but only to the vessels of nations "observing these rules." The United States "adopted" these rules. Is it possible that the United States adopted certain rules and then said to herself that she might enter the canal by "observing these rules," and that she would shut herself out of her own canal if she did not?

Fourth. The interpretation of a treaty, like the construction of a contract, is to be made by due consideration of the whole instrument considered. The interpretation of any article of a treaty must rest upon the same basis of construction. Article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty has six rules. We have already quoted the language of rule 1. Rules 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 may be briefly summarized as follows: That the canal shall never be blockaded; that the war vessels of a belligerent shall not revictual or take stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; that no belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or war-like materials in the canal; that the provisions of article 3 shall apply to the waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end; that warships of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time; and that the vessels of war of one belligerent shall not pursue those of another for 24 hours.

Is it possible that the United States "adopted" these five rules, the substance of which has just been given, to govern her own conduct in time of war? Could any supposition be more preposterous? A literal compliance with these five rules would keep the United States from blockading her own canal in time of war; would prevent her war vessels from revictualing or taking stores in the canal in time of war; would prevent her from embarking or disembarking her own troops; and would make of the canal an open rendezvous for the warships of her enemies. Such a proposition is absurd upon its face. The absurdity is only intensified by the further consideration that all treaties are abrogated by a state of war.

These considerations show that rules 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 were never intended by either of the high contracting parties to apply to the United States. By what canon of reasonable construction, then, can rule 1 of the same article be made to apply, since there is nothing in the language to show that it was intended to include the United States in the scope of its application?

If five out of six of the rules of article 3 do not apply to the United States, how can it be said with reason that the United States is included in "all nations observing these rules"?

Fifth. Let us consider now whether the phrase "vessels of commerce," in rule 1 of article 3, intends to include or reasonably includes coastwise vessels of the United States. A simple and logical deduction of reason from the fact heretofore established that the United States is not included in the term "all nations observing these rules" clearly demonstrates that "vessels of commerce" referred to in the treaty do not necessarily include coastwise vessels of the United States.

The language of the treaty is "vessels of commerce and of war." It must be inevitably inferred that if "vessels of commerce" are included, "vessels of war" of the United States must also be included. There is no possible escape from the conclusion. But the British Government and the advocates of this repeal measure both admit that American war vessels are of necessity exempted from the operation of the treaty. A strict and reasonable interpretation, however, forces us to exempt both or neither.

Moreover, the British Government is estopped from denying our right to exempt our coastwise trade from payment of tolls. This estoppel consists both in official admission and in treaty analogy.

In the note of British protest, dated July 8, 1912, this statement is made:

> If the trade could be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic which is reserved for United States vessels would be benefited, it may be that no objection could be taken.

This is a clear official admission that the United States may exempt her coastwise vessels from payment of tolls, if she so desires.

In 1815 a treaty of commerce was concluded between Great Britain and the United States. A paragraph of that treaty provides:

> No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States; nor in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

Nothing could be clearer than this language, and yet neither the United States nor England ever contended that the provision applied to the coastwise trade of either country. Thus an American ship entering and departing at Bristol, England, pays port charges at the rate of 56 cents per ton, while only 20 cents per ton are paid for the same charges by a British coastwise ship. An American vessel crossing the sea and entering the harbor of Liverpool must pay port charges for entering and leaving of 33 cents per ton, while a British coastwise vessel pays 9 cents per ton for the same charges.

This principle of the treaty of 1815 was formally adjudicated by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 344). Chief Justice White, then Mr. Justice White, rendered the decision, which, among other things, was as follows:

> Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage, resulting from the law of the United States, nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law, concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and, therefore, any such exemption does not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in the foreign trade and in favor of vessels of the United States in such trade.

It seems clear that England is estopped, both by official admission and by the analogy of her own treaties of commerce, from denying our right to exempt our coastwise vessels from paying tolls while passing through the Panama Canal.

Sixth. It only remains now to discuss briefly the question whether the exemption of American coastwise vessels constitutes such a discrimination against the vessels of other nations as is forbidden by the treaty. A sufficient answer to this question is that where there is no competition there can be no discrimination. The laws of the United States forbid foreign vessels to carry on any trade along our coasts. Our coastwise trade is purely a domestic affair, and there can be no possible hurt or disadvantage in any regulations that we may make for the government of our coastwise traffic.

But it is contended that if American coastwise vessels are exempted from the payment of tolls, the vessels of other nations will be compelled to pay in consequence a higher rate of charges, which will constitute discrimination, and will, furthermore, violate another passage of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which provides that "conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable."

The answer to this contention is that President Taft included in his estimate of the total tonnage passing through the canal, in reaching the present tentative rate of tolls of $1.20 per ton, 1,000,000 tons as representing American coastwise shipping. This calculation makes the relative burden of British ships for the support and maintenance of the canal exactly what it would otherwise be, if tolls were actually collected from American coastwise shipping. The difference is deducted from the interest charges on United States money invested in the canal and comes from the Treasury of the United States. England is not remotely discriminated against in the estimate and arrangement of tolls.

In this connection it may be said that the meanness of the British spirit is shown by the fact that, although we built the canal with our own money and on our own land, England will derive more benefit from it than any other nation on the earth.

The remarks of Mr. Page, our ambassador to England, at a recent banquet, along this line, may have been unhappy and ill-timed, but they were true. England will be the great beneficiary of the opening of this international waterway. A recent writer upon this subject says:

The tonnage of British steam and sailing vessels is greater than that of all other maritime nations combined. It is reasonably certain that a far greater tonnage of British vessels will receive the benefits arising from the use of the shortened route through the canal than of American vessels, and that, too, for many years to come. This superiority of tonnage will give the British subjects a far more favored position in the use of the canal than American subjects not only in the matter of keeping their established trade proof against American competition, but also in respect of the new trade, which will be made profitable as the direct consequence of the opening of the canal—and not only in respect of the transportation of goods in such trade, but more especially in respect of winning the new markets for the exclusive sale of British products. It is certain that for many years the bulk of the goods of American manufacturers will have to be carried to the west coast of South America in foreign bottoms, mostly British. Many other secondary factors, such as way-station freights, favorable shipping combinations and pools, and governmental subsidies, for all of which American vessels have no equivalent, combine to increase the actual advantage of British shipping not only generally, but also directly in respect of the traffic through the Panama Canal. On the other hand, the owners of British ships have contributed nothing to the vast expenditure of human energy and skill and human life at Panama, and they carry no part of the burdens and risks of the building, operation, and protection of the canal, nor are they as a class subject to the special restrictive conditions as to the use of the canal imposed in the canal act upon American shipping.

The close and calculating, the greedy and grasping spirit of England in making this protest may be well illustrated by a brief comparison of the Suez Canal, British controlled, with the Panama Canal, American controlled.

The Suez Canal is owned by a stock company and is practically under the control of the British Government, which owns 176,602 of the 379,421 shares of the capital stock, purchased in 1875, at a cost of $19,855,320. This canal was opened in 1869. It is 103 miles long, and 17 hours are required for passage through it. At the end of the year 1910 the expenditures on the Suez Canal had amounted to $126,642,406 and the outstanding capital obligations amounted to only $92,484,544.

The Panama Canal cost $375,000,000. It is 54 miles long and requires less than 12 hours for passage through it.

We charge British ships $1.20 per net ton for passage through our canal. The British charge American ships $1.30 per net ton for passage through theirs. This is the difference between British and American commercial hospitality. And yet, in the face of these facts, England is afraid that she is being discriminated against and that conditions and charges of traffic through the Panama Canal under our management will not be just and equitable.

After all, however, it is not the spirit of England that we should detest; it is the American spirit that would basely yield, in a most cowardly manner, to unreasonable British demands. England is expected to guard jealously her own commercial interests and to see that no points are lost. But we should not be so forgetful of our own just rights and highest interests as to surrender without question to the demands of England or any other power.

Gentlemen of the Democratic Party denounce subsidies and inveigh against monopolies. And yet there is not one of them who does not know that the colossal sum of money invested in the Panama Canal is nothing more than a huge subsidy for the British Navy and the British merchant marine. We have undertaken and accomplished the most gigantic engineering feat of all the centuries at our own expense, chiefly for the benefit of British ships. Mr. Page told a British audience so, and then we stupidly showed our resentment at the simple recital of a fact.

It is a distressing thing that American representatives are so eager to promote British commercial supremacy at the expense of the very existence of the few phantom ships of their vanishing merchant marine. In 1870 about 35 per cent of American shipping was carried in American vessels. To-day it has fallen to 9 per cent of all sea-borne American traffic, and in a few years, if the present course of conduct be continued, American ships will have been completely driven from the seas. Do gentlemen of the opposition take pleasure in this prospect?

Reply is frequently made that if the American merchant marine can not live without subsidy it must perish utterly. This may be Democratic, but it is not American doctrine. Indeed, it is not even Democratic doctrine, for while Democrats and the Democratc Party have frequently denounced subsidies, they have always favored discriminations in favor of American shipping. This policy was well stated a few days ago by Mr. UNDERWOOD in his great speech delivered before this House in the following language:

The purpose of Congress in providing in the act for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the canal "that no tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States," and providing, further, that it should be left discretionary with the President of the United States to exempt from tolls our ships engaged in foreign trade, was an effort on the part of Congress to discriminate in favor of American shipping and to reestablish our merchant marine. This has been a policy of the Democratic Party since the beginning of the Government. The Democratic Party has never stood for direct subsidies, but has always favored subventions and discriminations in favor of our shipping. It was through discriminating tariff duties that our merchant marine was developed in the first three decades of our Government's existence. The Democratic tariff law that is now on the statute books carries in it a discrimination amounting to a reduction of 5 per cent of the duties on goods imported in American ships.

During the progress of this debate it has been frequently contended by advocates of the pending measure that an economic mistake was made when Congress enacted the law two years ago exempting American coastwise vessels from payment of tolls, that the exemption practically granted a subsidy to such vessels, and that the American people would be taxed to sustain the subsidy.

It is interesting to note how completely the President and the Democratic Members of this House have changed front since 1912. Then the slogan of all the parties, including the Democratic, was that exemption from payment of tolls to American coastwise ships would create competition in freight rates between the great transcontinental roads of America and the American coastwise ships, and that the American people generally would be the beneficiaries of the happy result of this competition. The Progressive national platform specifically declared for free tolls on the ground that it would "break transportation monopoly now held and misused by the transcontinental railroads, by maintaining sea competition with them." President Wilson, speaking to the farmers at Washington Park, N. J., said:

We want water carriage to compete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent.

Now all this is changed. We were wrong then and are right now, although the industrial and economic situation of the world has not changed, although not a single new fact has been discovered to show why we were wrong then and right now.

We are simply asked to reverse our policy, to admit that our platforms were all wrong, that the judgments of the best and wisest of our statesmen were false, and that the entire American electorate were deluded and deceived, in order that the President may be relieved of embarrassing foreign difficulties.

What the "foreign policy" of the President is, what the "matters of even greater delicacy" are, nobody seems to know. Bryan may have an inkling, but I am convinced that not another soul on the earth has the remotest idea. It has been described as "watching and waiting." The alliteration of the phrase and the cowardice suggested are the only things that impress us deeply in this definition.

The paralyzing proposition of the President is that we shall pass this bill whether we are "right or wrong" in our contention. If the people of America could vote upon this proposition, their answer would come back in a voice of thunder that would shake the continent: "Yes, pass it if we are wrong; but if we are right, never, even though all the nations of mankind threaten us."

The President has appealed to the sentiment of honor in this House and in the Nation. This is the most powerful appeal that could have been made. The Members of the Congress have been crazed and blinded by it. It has swept Reason from her throne and Judgment from her seat. Under the spell of the shibboleth Members have forgotten their platform pledges, have become deaf to the voices of their orators and statesmen, have ignored the mandate of the electorate, and, what is worse than all, have failed to stop to inquire seriously whether we are right or wrong. A political stampede has been the result.

The President of the United States has no keener, deeper sense of honor than I have. He does not love his country more than I do. I, for one, would give my good right arm before I would cast a vote either in or out of Congress that would dishonor my country or humiliate my countrymen. But I must insist upon the utmost freedom of tongue and brain. I must be permitted to insist that the privileges and immunities of this House are as sacred as the prerogatives of the President. I must claim the right to be allowed to review, revise, and reject his judgment as to what is right and wrong if I see fit.

After all facts have been stated and arguments offered, it must be admitted that the form of the President's message conveying his request was exceedingly tactless and unhappy. It is shrouded in mystery and suggestive of humiliating compromise under foreign pressure. He has gotten upon the nerves of his countrymen by making a request that tends to wound their pride and crush their spirit. The whole tenor of the message is that we must sacrifice rights, if need be, to secure freedom from foreign aggression. Nothing could more surely gall the pride of a free and patriotic people. Nothing could more certainly humiliate them than a suggestion of "peace at any price."

There is inherent in the highest and noblest of the human species a quality of courage which knows no fear; that prefers death and annihilation to dishonor and disgrace; that believes, with Cæsar, that it is better to die at once than to live always in fear of death, and, with Mahomet, that paradise will be found in the shadow of the crossing of swords. This quality of courage is peculiar to no race of men and to no form of civilization. It has existed everywhere and at all times. It causes the spirit of man to tread the earth like a lion and to mount the air like an eagle. Against this sentiment of courage, which is natural to man, the President has offended by his message.

The people of my district, like those of yours, my colleagues, are God-fearing and peace-loving. They pray for peace perpetual, with national honor unimpaired. But they are red-blooded Americans all, who love their country, believe in it, adore its flag, and are ready, if need be, to fight and die for both. They will sustain and support the President forever if the spirit that animates him is that of courage and righteousness; they will condemn and despise him forever if the spirit of cowardice causes him to degrade and humiliate them.

We all believe in peace, and ardently desire it. The true philosopher of history sees in the ever-increasing desire for peace throughout the world conclusive evidence of the advance of man along lines of progress and upon the highway of civilization. But if we delude ourselves into the belief that the millennium of peace is here, we have to reflect but a moment upon Gibraltar, the fortresses upon the Rhine, the standing armies of the nations, and the battleships that float the sea to have the delusion completely dispelled.

The fate of nations—

Says a great modern American orator—

is still decided by their wars. You may talk of orderly tribunals and learned referees; you may sing in your schools the gentle praises of the quiet life; you may strike from your books the last note of every martial anthem, and yet out in the smoke and thunder will always be the tramp of horses and the silent, rigid, upturned face. Men may prophesy and women pray, but peace will come here to abide forever upon this earth only when the dreams of childhood are the accepted charts to guide the destinies of men.

The request of the President to pass this bill should be refused, because it compromises and insults the courage of the people and the martial spirit of the Nation. The timid and vacillating language of the message conveying the request is itself a novelty in American political literature and a flat contradiction of the brave and splendid utterances of the heroes of our history. Listen for a minute:

I have not yet begun to fight!—Paul Jones.
Don't give up the ship!—Lawrence.
I would rather be right than be President!—Henry Clay.
We have met the enemy, and they are ours!—Perry.
Millions for defense but not one cent for tribute!—Pinckney.
I regret that I have but one life to give to my country!—Nathan Hale.
In the name of the Great Jehovah and the Continental Congress!—Ethan Allen.
If any man attempts to pull down the American flag, shoot him on the spot!—John A. Dix.

These were the brave words, the patriotic sentiments of Americans of other days, men of blood and iron, whose voices in the Senate were those of Stentor, and whose hearts upon the battle field beat like kettledrums. Now, listen for a moment and contrast:

We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong!—Wilson.

I wish to repeat what I said in the beginning of my speech, that for President Wilson I have the kindliest feelings and the sincerest personal regard. He is the President not of the Democratic Party but of the whole American people. He is our President, and we should sympathize with him, help him, and sustain him whenever we can conscientiously, regardless of our political affiliations. But we should not forget that he is only the President. He is not the people. His request is not as binding as their mandate. Every Member of this House is under instructions from the people, given at the polls in November, 1912, to vote for free tolls for American coastwise vessels passing through the Panama Canal. Those instructions have not been recalled or modified. They are sacredly binding upon each and every one of us. I for one will not violate my instructions. I for one will not defy the mandate of the people to please the President.

I believe that the passage of this bill would be an insult to the American people. My notions of national honor compel me to respect the rights and privileges, the feelings and sentiments, of Americans rather than seek to gain the esteem and approbation of Englishmen. I will be no party to the degradation of my country and the humiliation of my countrymen.

If this bill must pass, if the blow must fall, let us hope that some way may be found, some amendment be offered in the Senate, some referendum be devised, that will delay the final passage until the people themselves can act, and either affirm or reverse their action of two years ago, and give final instructions to their Representatives in Congress. In this way the wrong can be properly righted, if wrong has been done.

And if while honestly seeking to satisfy at once both the demands of the nations and our own sense of pride and self-respect England or any other power threatens us, instead of basely passing this repeal bill of surrender and of shame, let us rush through both the House and the Senate a joint resolution expressing the sense of the Congress that the President should make a pilgrimage to the shrine of the hermitage and to the grave of Jackson, there to receive new inspiration to brave and patriotic life, then to return to the White House to act as becomes the President of a republic whose people are neither cravens nor cowards and whose martial spirit is not dead. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I hold no brief to speak for the President of the United States; I am not of his party; but I would infinitely rather have the country divided between the President and the rest of us than between the coastwise shipping monopoly and the rest of us. [Applause.] There has been a good deal said about the vast amount of money we are expending in the construction of the Panama Canal, and that has been given as a reason why we ought to send the coastwise ships through the canal free.

Mr. Speaker, I voted against free tolls two years ago. I intend to vote that way now. I believed then that I was right, and I am now more convinced than ever of the justice of my action. I voted against free tolls two years ago—

First, because I believed that it would not be honorable to do as a Representative what I am sure it would not be honorable to do as an individual. Whatever may be thought about the wisdom of the contract which exists between the United States and Great Britain is not material to the proper consideration of this case. There is such a contract and the United States is one of the parties to it and bound by its provisions.

Section 1 of article 3 of this contract provides:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

There can be no doubt about the meaning of this language. That it is binding on the United States in honor and in law I have never had any doubt. I would consider it binding upon me if I had signed such a contract, and I can not bring myself to believe that the United States is not, by every consideration, bound both by the letter and the spirit of the contract. Believing so, I can not conceive how it would be possible for me to vote to pass coastwise ships through the canal free. The people of the United States are too honorable, too great, too powerful, and too just to do anything about the propriety of which there can be the slightest doubt.

Second. The construction of the canal gives the seacoast territory advantages not enjoyed by the interior of the country, and the right to pass coastwise ships through the canal free would add to the advantages of the seacoast territory and increase the discrimination against the interior.

Discrimination in favor of coastwise ships would not, as many argue, aid in building up an American merchant marine, but it would add to the earnings of the existing monopoly and would increase the burdens of the people living in the interior of the country whose freight rates on interior shipments would be increased.

Third. The canal will have cost when completed $375,000,000. The people of the Central West have paid their portion of that cost. They will secure no direct advantage from the expenditure of this money. Why, then, add to their burdens by compelling them to pay a subsidy to coastwise ships and the increased rates on the shipment of their products in the interior?

The annual cost of maintaining the canal will be about $25,000,000, made up as follows: Interest charge, $10,000,000; for maintaining an army on the Isthmus, $10,000,000; to operate the canal, $4,000,000; to maintain it, $1,000,000.

With this large annual expenditure of money there can be no sane reason why ships owned by anybody except the Government itself should be passed through the canal without paying tolls.

Coastwise ships, having a monopoly on the coastwise trade, are owned by American citizens, it is true, but the men owning these ships are in the business of transporting commodities for profit. The coastwise shipping industry is a profitable institution. I am told that dividends at the rate of about 15 per cent per annum are paid to stockholders in coastwise shipping companies. There is no more reason why these dividends should be increased at the expense of the taxpayers than there is that the profit of the farmer should be increased or that the wages of the mechanic should be increased or that the salary of the preacher should be increased by the payment of a subsidy out of the pockets of the taxpayers.

Fourth. Free tolls would be a discrimination against other nations that we have promised to treat on terms of equality, and the honor of the United States will not admit of such discrimination.

I think the President of the United States made a mistake in his message to Congress asking for the repeal of the law admitting coastwise ships through the canal free when he said in the last paragraph of his message delivered in person to a joint session of the Senate and House on March 5, 1914:

> I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

In my opinion there was no reason whatever for making such a statement. I do not believe he was justified in making it. The repeal of the law should be based on the sense of honor of the American people, without respect to what effect it might have on the minds of other peoples. The question of the repeal had sufficient merit in itself as a strictly American institution to justify the enactment of the present bill into law, and I can not help but regret that the President's message was not based on the simple desire of the American people to be just, rather than on what effect our failure to repeal the law would have on the attitude of other nations.

I do not agree with the opinion of many that American warships, under the terms of the treaty, will be required to pay tolls for passing through the canal. The Government itself owns the canal and owns the ships, and to say that the owner of the canal would not be entitled to pass its own ships through the canal without the payment of tolls seems ridiculous on its face.

A reasonable construction of the treaty can not but lead to the conclusion that ships of all nations must be treated on terms of entire equality. It can not be expected that all will agree on the construction of language, whatever it may be. There will necessarily be just differences of opinion as to what such language means, but there can be no doubt in the mind of any fair-minded man, who has given proper study to the question, about what should be done where a question of honor is involved.

The United States has entered into two treaties concerning the use and control of the Panama Canal, both of which are in force now. The first, known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, was initiated by Secretary of State John Hay in 1898, signed in Washington November 18, 1901, ratified by the Senate December 16, 1901, and proclaimed by the President February 22, 1902. The second treaty was with Panama, signed at Washington November 18, 1903, ratified by the Senate February 23, 1904, and proclaimed by the President February 26, 1904. Article 18 of the latter treaty provides for the operation of the canal on the terms of the treaty with Great Britain, so that there is no need to separately discuss its provisions.

The section of the treaty with Great Britain which is the center of this controversy is No. 1 of article 3, as follows:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

From its terms there can be no inequality or discrimination for or against any vessel, citizen, or traffic of any country, and all must be treated exactly alike, subject to the same toll charges and conditions, without any distinction.

Some argue that under the provisions of article 2 of the treaty the United States may have all the rights incident to the construction of the canal, including the exclusive right of regulation and management, and that in making such rules and regulations they urge that discrimination can be shown to domestic vessels in trade, but I submit that such a construction can not be properly made of the language used in the treaty.

Section 1 of article 3 should be considered together with article 2, which provides three methods of constructing the canal, one of which is by the United States itself, at its own cost; another by individuals or corporations, authorized and assisted by the United States by loans or gifts of money; and the third by individuals or corporations with whom the United States may cooperate through the subscription to or purchase of stock or shares.

Article 2 reads as follows:

> It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

There is nothing in the treaty that indicates that coastwise ships shall be treated differently from ships engaged in foreign commerce, whether the canal be constructed by private corporations or the Government itself. If a corporation had constructed the canal under the terms of the treaty at its own expense and was operating it for a profit, as the Suez Canal was constructed and is operated, it will not be contended that such a corporation could be compelled by law to exempt coastwise ships from the payment of tolls.

The United States had the right to adopt any one of the three methods in the construction of the canal. Congress decided by law to have the Government itself build the canal, and the fact that it has built it must of necessity make the same rule apply to the construction and operation by the United States as by a private corporation doing the same thing, because the same rules and authority apply to both.

If the United States had decided to authorize a corporation to build the canal, it will not be contended that it would have the right to say to the corporation that one of the conditions upon which such authority was granted would be the exemption of coastwise ships, because that very term is prohibited by the language of section 1 of article 3 of the treaty. Besides, any stockholder in the corporation would have the right to object to any part of the revenue of the canal being paid over in the form of a subsidy to coastwise ships, and in that way being taken from the treasury of the corporation itself. A German, French, English, or Japanese shipowner might have subscribed to the stock of the corporation provided for in article 2, and they might, with equal propriety, demand the right of exemption for their ships on account of such stock ownership. Nobody would agree that such a demand could be properly complied with; indeed, it would be absurd to think of it; and yet there would be as much justice in their claim to exemption as there is to the claim that the United States may, with propriety, exempt coastwise ships from the payment of tolls.

The opinion of notable authorities is to the effect that no exemption is provided for in the treaty.

Prof. John Bassett Moore, perhaps the highest authority on this subject, has said that—

> Equality of tolls has also been treated as a feature or perhaps rather as a condition of neutralization. Little need to be said on the subject since a discriminating policy, even if it did not lead to the building of another canal, would merely provoke retaliation in some form and prove in the end to be impracticable.

Senator Davis, of Minnesota, from the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, recommending the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, said:

> That the United States sought no exclusive privilege or preferential right of any kind in regard to the proposed communication, and their sincere wish, if it should be found practical, was to see it dedicated to the common use of all nations on the most liberal terms and a footing of perfect equality for all.
> That the United States would not if they could obtain any exclusive right or privilege in a great highway which naturally belongs to all mankind.
> That while they aim at no exclusive privilege for themselves, they could never consent to see so important a communication fall under the exclusive control of any other great commercial power.
> If, however, the British Government shall reject these overtures on our part, and shall refuse to cooperate with us in the generous and philanthropic scheme of rendering the interoceanic communication by the way of the port and river San Juan free to all nations upon the same terms, we shall deem ourselves justified in protecting our interest independently of aid and despite of her opposition or hostility.
> It was an explicit and peremptory demand for an agreement that would give to Nicaragua the freedom of exit to the sea through the San Juan River for a ship canal that should be open to all nations on equal terms and protected by an agreement of perfect neutrality.
> In the origin of our claim to the right of way for our people and our produce, armies, mails, and other property through the canal, we offer to dedicate the canal to the equal use of mankind.
> As to neutrality and the exclusive control of the canal and its dedication to universal use, the suggestions that were incorporated in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty came from the United States and were concurred in by Great Britain. In no instance has the Government of the United States intimated an objection to this treaty on account of the features of neutrality, its equal and impartial use by all other nations.
> No American statesman, speaking with official authority or responsibility, has ever intimated that the United States would attempt to control this canal for the exclusive benefit of our Government or people. They have all, with one accord, declared that the canal was to be neutral ground in time of war and always open on terms of impartial equity to the ships and commerce of the world.
> Special treaties for the neutrality, impartiality, freedom, and innocent use of the two canals that are to be the eastern and western gateways of commerce between the two great oceans are not in keeping with the magnitude and universality of the blessings they must confer upon mankind. The subject rather belongs to the domain of international law.
> The leading powers of Europe recognized the importance of this subject in respect of the Suez Canal, and ordained a public international act for its neutralization that is an honor to the civilization of the age. It is the beneficent work of all Europe and not of Great Britain alone. Whenever a canal is built in the Isthmus of Darien, it will be ultimately made subject to the same law of freedom and neutrality as governs the Suez Canal, as a part of the laws of nations, and no single power will be able to resist its control.

The European powers gave to this subject the greatest consideration, and reached conclusions that are not open to criticism as being unjust to any nation in the world. Turkey and Egypt, the imperial and the local sovereigns of the canal, and Great Britain, a controlling stockholder in the Maritime Canal Co., had special interests in the rules for regulating the use of the canal, and they united in the convention which deprived them of exceptional privileges in its navigation, in peace and in war, for the sake of justice to all maritime nations and the peace and prosperity of the world.

No nation disapproves of this great act, or has had grounds of complaint against it. No American will ever be found to complain of it. It is right in its moral features, in its impartiality, and, above all, in its tendency to decrease the resort to war for the settlement of international quarrels, and will have the cordial approval of the American people.

The United States can not take an attitude of opposition to the principles of the great act of October 22, 1888, without discrediting the official declarations of our Government for 50 years on the neutrality of an isthmian canal and its equal use by all nations, without discrimination.

To set up the selfish motive of gain by establishing a monopoly of a highway that must derive its income from the patronage of all maritime countries, would be unworthy of the United States if we owned the country through which the canal is to be built.

But the location of the canal belongs to other governments, from whom we must obtain any right to construct a canal on their territory, and it is not unreasonable, if the question was new and was not involved in a subsisting treaty with Great Britain, that she should question the right of even Nicaragua and Costa Rica to grant to our ships of commerce and of war extraordinary privileges of transit through the canal.

It is not reasonable to suppose that Nicaragua and Costa Rica would grant to the United States the exclusive control of a canal through those States on terms less generous to the other maritime nations than those prescribed in the great act of October 22, 1888; or if we could compel them to give us such advantages over other nations it would not be creditable to our country to accept them.

That our Government or our people will furnish the money to build the canal presents the single question whether it is profitable to do so. If the canal, as property, is worth more than its cost, we are not called on to divide the profits with other nations. If it is worth less, and we are compelled by national necessities to build the canal, we have no right to call on other nations to make up the loss to us. In any view, it is a venture that we will enter upon if it is to our interest, and if it is otherwise we will withdraw from its further consideration.

In this convention we stipulate against the blockade of the canal by any nation.

In conditions that may not be entirely remote we would find this provision, in letting our ships through the canal free from capture by our enemy, of great security to our coastwise trade.

The language of the preamble of the treaty is in terms as follows:

The United States of America and His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, etc., being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th of April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed, etc.

Moore's Digest on International Law, volume 5, page 249, says:

It is a general principle of construction with respect to treaties that they shall be liberally construed, so as to carry out the apparent intentions of the parties to secure equality and reciprocity between them. As they are contracts between independent nations in their construction, words are to be taken in their ordinary meaning as understood in the public law of nations, and not in any artificial or special sense impressed upon them by local law, unless such restricted sense is clearly intended. And it has been held by this court that where a treaty admits of two constructions, one restrictive of rights that may be claimed under it and the other favorable to them, the latter is to be preferred.

Article 1 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty reads, in part, as follows:

Nor will the United States or Great Britain take advantage of any intimacy or use any influence, etc., for the purpose of acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one, any rights or advantages in regard to commerce and navigation through the said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms to the other.

Article 5, in substance:

The contracting parties further engage that they will guarantee the neutrality thereof, which protection may be withdrawn if unfair discriminations are made in favor of the commerce of the one over the commerce of the other.

Article 6, in part:

The contracting parties engage to invite every State, etc., to enter into stipulations concerning the constructing and maintaining the said canal—for the benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all—and of protecting the same.

President Roosevelt in his message of December 4, 1901, transmitting to the Senate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which was ratified and is now in effect, described it as "a convention without impairing the general principle of neutralization established, and so forth, in article 8 of that convention." Further, on the 22d of February, 1902, in the proclamation making such treaty effective, President Roosevelt, in the preamble to it, again sets forth the existence of the "general principle" of neutralization, which was to be maintained by such treaty, and in the final statement of the proclamation is found this clause:

To the end that the same and every article and clause thereof may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof.

Secretary of State John Hay began his negotiations for the modification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty in a letter dated December 7, 1898, to the Hon. Henry White, chargé at London, and Mr. White replied December 22, 1898. Considerable correspondence followed, from a reading of which it appears that the condition upon which the Clayton-Bulwer treaty could be modified must be that all vessels of all nations must receive in the canal the same treatment as American vessels.

This Government readily agreed to such conditions, and nobody at the time objected to it, and so the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was prepared, under the direction of President McKinley, by John Hay, then Secretary of State.

During all the negotiations for the modification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and an agreement on the Hay-Pauncefote treaty there appears to have been no thought of exemptions to coastwise ships.

During the proceedings in the Senate for the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, December 13, 1900, Senator Bard moved to strike out article 3 and substitute the following:

The United States reserves the right in the regulation and management of the canal to discriminate in respect of the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade.

This amendment was defeated by a vote of yeas 27, nays 43, so that even as far back as 1900 it is evident that the Senate in considering the treaty clearly intended not to exempt coastwise ships.

While the Senate was considering the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in December, 1901, a confidential memorandum was sent to that body by Secretary of State John Hay, the substance of which is as follows:

(1) With this is submitted the new treaty, which declared the neutrality of canal for the use of all nations "on terms of entire equality."

(2) The United States alone adopts the rules as a basis for neutralization; and adopts and prescribes the rules by which the use of the canal shall be regulated, and assumes the entire responsibility and burden of enforcing its absolute neutrality without the assistance of Great Britain or any other nation.

(3) It was considered that war between the contracting parties or between the United States with any other power would have the ordinary effect when not specifically otherwise provided; and remit both parties to their original and natural right of self-defense, and give the United States the clear right to close the canal against the other belligerent, and to protect and defend it by whatever means might be necessary.

(4) The whole theory of the treaty is that it is to be exclusively the property of the United States, and is to be managed, controlled, and defended by it. Under these circumstances it was thought fair to omit prohibition of fortification.

(5) The sixth clause of article 3, referring to plant, etc., was inserted so that it should come within the rules of neutrality and should be respected at all times by all nations.

(6) The general principle of neutrality was reaffirmed, preserved, and secured against any change of sovereignty of Panama.

(7) The President takes the position that the United States built the canal at its sole cost for the equal benefit of all nations.

(8) The general principle of neutralization and equality has always been insisted upon by the United States, and it has recognized in this way the justice of the request of Great Britain on condition that she surrendered important national and material interests in the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. So that this general principle and its application to the sovereignty of Panama should be maintained.

(9) These rules (based on neutralization and equality) are adopted in the treaty with Great Britain as a consideration for getting rid of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

(10) Upon the consideration and at the same time to put all powers on the same footing, by complying with the rules of neutrality, this section 1, article 3, was framed and adopted.

There should be no doubt in the face of Secretary Hay's very complete statement of the responsibilities involved that the Senate thoroughly understood the obligations of the United States and that these obligations included equal treatment to ships of all nations. It will be observed that no mention is made in Mr. Hay's memorandum of exemption to coastwise ships.

We have promised the world that the canal will be constructed, maintained, and operated for the benefit of the world's commerce, and that no unfair advantage will be taken of anybody. We have treaty obligations under which all nations, all commerce, all people, and all ports are to be treated without discrimination. Are we to forget these obligations and for the sake of the benefit that may accrue to the small industry and a single section of our country break our pledges, violate our contract, and discriminate against the world for one of our own interests?

Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Colombia, Mexico, Guatemala, and Honduras all have coastwise trade between the two oceans, amounting to $700,000,000 a year with the United States. We may reasonably hope that by the construction of the canal this trade will be largely increased, but we must not jeopardize it by violating our promises to these nations. We must not discriminate against them, nor against their citizens, nor their commerce. We must be honorable with them, deserve their confidence, not invite their condemnation. They are in direct competition with us; they have a right to expect that this competition will be fair, and we must do our part to make it so. We must not yield to the clamor of selfish interests nor break our pledges to the world that these selfish interests may be given advantages which we have promised not to give. Our duty to our own people and to the world is to give evidence of our disinterested fairness. We must show that we are always ready to live up to our contracts if we hope to maintain the respect and confidence and good will of mankind. [Applause.]

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, in one of the Lincoln-Douglas debates Mr. Lincoln was delayed in his arrival at the place where the debate was to be held. Mr. Douglas, one of the great orators of the country, was making a powerful address to a large audience. Mr. Lincoln took his seat on the platform, awaiting the conclusion of Mr. Douglas's speech. After the applause, which lasted for 10 or 15 minutes, the people looked expectantly at Mr. Lincoln. He did not rise. He sat and watched the audience. The interest became intense, but still he did not rise. Many minutes passed and Lincoln's friends quietly whispered to him, "Are you intending to speak?" After some minutes he rose slowly to his feet, clad in a long, flowing duster. He slipped his left arm out of the sleeve, then the right arm out of the sleeve, the duster from his shoulders, held it up in front of him, shook the folds out of it, folded it together into a small package, and turning to a young man sitting next to him on the platform, said, "Young man, hold my garment while I stone Stephen." Believing Douglas's political principles and propositions to be wrong at that time, he vigorously assailed them. Likewise believing the proposition before this House to be wrong, I intend to speak against it.

On two former occasions conditions similar to this have been presented to the United States—one in the administration of Lincoln. No crisis that ever came upon this country equalled the one through which he successfully guided the affairs of state. The same country that makes a demand on us to-day made a demand on him that the union of the States was impractical; that Americans should abandon the attempt to reunite the States and listen to what was said to them from across the water. Disturbance of trade and other reasons were advanced. No one who was not in the secret councils of our Government or of the English Government will know the tremendous strain and stress that Lincoln worked under at that time, but he had only one answer, which was the answer he made to the people in the Cooper Union speech, and the answer he made all along the line—"Our Federal Union, it must be preserved." And standing to that proposition, in spite of pressure brought to bear upon him by the English Government, and in spite of tremendous difficulties at home, he safely conducted our Nation through the war and brought us out with the profound respect of the English Government. We never lose in national prestige, we never lose in national strength, when our Government stands staunchly for a right reserved to the American people, but we do lose in national self-respect and in prestige abroad if having a proposition in our favor, if having rights reserved to ourselves, we let another nation dictate what our course shall be.

I have another instance in mind. The last preceding Democratic President was a man who commands my profound esteem. I differed with him in many of his policies, but of his American strength of character or his American insistence on the rights and policies of our country there can be nothing said but words of highest praise. The same country that says to us to-day, This is what the Hay-Pauncefote treaty means and you must accept our interpretation of it, said to the administration of Mr. Cleveland, "We claim certain rights in Venezuela and we propose to press those rights; we know the policy you call the Monroe doctrine, but we do not intend to defer to your contention." Yet Mr. Cleveland, and Mr. Olney, then Secretary of State, steadfastly upheld the contentions of this country so successfully that the English were compelled to withdraw their claims. We gained in national prestige, and the nations of the earth paid us increased respect because of this sturdy adherence to the principles that we have adopted for the government of our own affairs.

Purely American questions these were. We have to-day another purely American question, with the same power making a demand upon us that closely touches our self-respect, and the question is, Shall we yield to that insistent demand? We may alter or modify our laws in the pursuit of justice or for more perfect expression of the public will or to promote our welfare, but at the demand of another country, never. However, I am saying no unkind words of the English Government at this time. It has probably regarded it as its duty to take advantage of wording in the treaty—susceptible, it may be, of a forced construction—that will gain for them a most material advantage. They see opening through the canal a gateway to a very largely increased commerce. Their carrying trade brings into the treasuries of their people hundreds of millions of dollars annually. If they can increase their carrying trade and prevent the development of carrying trade of this country, so much the more will the revenues of their citizens be increased. But I say to you, my friends on the floor of this House, that we are not legislating here for the advantage of the British subjects. I wish them well and hope they shall prosper; but now is the hour and now is the day when the American people look out for the first time with hopeful vision on a wide expansion of our commerce through the construction of the canal, built with our own treasure and devised by our own brains. It is time we should stand firmly, insisting upon our rights, and governing our own canal in the manner we deem best for the public good, maintain our national honor and prestige as it was maintained in times past, and open up an unprecedented era of prosperity to our people. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, signed at Washington November 18, 1901, ratifications exchanged February 21, 1902, concerning the Panama Canal and known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, contains in article 3 six rules. The preamble of article 3 states "The United States adopts the following rules." I shall quote only rule 1, as it contains the provisions relative to tolls now in dispute:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or the citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

HAS THE UNITED STATES DISCRIMINATED AGAINST ANY NATION?

To do this the United States would need to admit for passage through the canal vessels engaged in the same kind of trade, coastwise or foreign, on different terms as to rates of tolls, supposing for the moment that term "all nations" includes the United States. Has this been proposed? On this matter of discrimination two questions have been raised:

First. The Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, provides in section 5:

No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States.

No foreign vessels can engage in the coastwise trade of the United States. Since only vessels flying the American flag can carry on this trade, no foreign vessel can claim to be discriminated against even if American ships are not charged tolls for using the canal, for since it is a trade in which foreign vessels can not participate, no basis exists upon which to charge discrimination.

Second. The same act says, "No vessel permitted to engage in the coastwise or foreign trade of the United States shall be permitted to enter or pass through said canal, if such ship is owned, chartered, operated, or controlled by any person or company which is doing business in violation of the provisions" of the several acts against trusts and monopolies. This is what is known as the provision against railroad-owned ships. It applies to our ships engaged in our coastwise trade, or to our vessels engaged in foreign trade, or to foreign vessels doing a carrying trade with us. It does not apply to foreign vessels doing business through the canal with foreign ports exclusively. No charge of discrimination can be based on this provision of the law, for where none are permitted to do certain things none are discriminated against.

THE REAL REASON FOR THE PROTEST.

For many years our merchant marine has languished. It is our one American industry that has fallen behind in the general development. We buy and sell abroad enormous quantities of products. Foreign vessels have found it very profitable to carry these for us. With the constructing of the canal the American interest in the deep-sea carrying trade is reviving. Our coastwise vessels, finding such trade through the canal profitable, will probably be induced to enlarge into the deep-sea traffic. Fearing this, the foreign shippers have moved the English Government to protest and to give such a construction to the treaty as will do the most harm to the American shipping and to suppress its development. In this it has been joined by transcontinental railroads, and it seems astonishing to me that American officials should have been misled into uniting with them. I am not charging corruption nor insinuating anything against the integrity of the administration, but I insist a great mistake is being proposed and a needless and unjustifiable abandonment of the American case in the face of foreign pressure. In his address before Congress on March 5, 1914, the President said, "We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong;" and also, "I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it me in ungrudging measure." "Right or wrong!" I regret that such words were ever said by an American President to an American Congress.

The Hon. Richard Olney, formerly Secretary of State under President Cleveland, said, on April 25, 1913:

The facts being, then, that the United States has rightfully built the canal through territory of its own; that besides having become the owner of the canal route, the treaty expressly accords to the United States all the rights incident to construction; and that, in undertaking the canal as a United States enterprise, the United States did so with the manifest purpose of excluding all foreign control beyond that resulting from the stipulation for equality of terms to all users of the canal—what is there in the language of the treaty to justify the claim that the United States has made a further submission to foreign control by a stipulation which prevents it from allowing the use of the canal by its own vessels or those of its nationals on any terms it chooses to fix? The treaty is a contract by which the proprietor of a canal fixes the terms upon which it grants the use of the canal to its customers.

It [the treaty] was needed for that purpose only; it was not needed to fix the terms upon which the United States and its nationals—its cestui que trust—should use the canal, because its use without tolls or otherwise as the United States might choose is a necessary incident of its ownership of the canal.

It can not reasonably be argued that, in fixing terms for the use of its canal by customers, the United States looked upon itself as one of the customers.

Besides, so far as the international law on the subject can be regarded as settled, the rule is that "While a natural thoroughfare, although wholly within the dominion of a Government, may be passed by commercial ships, of right, yet the nation which constructs an artificial channel may annex such conditions to its use as it pleases"—quoted from III John Bassett Moore's International Law Digest, page 268; The Avon, Eighteenth International Review Record, page 165.

That is, the Panama Canal is not a public water, but a private waterway of the United States. It is worthy of note that in rule 1, quoted above, it is stated that the "United States adopts the following rules." Not the United States and Great Britain, or the United States and any other country, but the United States alone. We present them as the basis upon which the other nations of the world, "observing these rules," can use the canal.

Hon. John Hay, formerly Secretary of State, and one of the signers of the treaty, said:

The vessels of any nation which shall refuse or fail to observe the rules adopted and prescribed may be deprived of the use of the canal.

The rules referred to are those we adopt and lay down to the world as the regulations governing the use of the canal. We will exclude them if they do not observe the rules. That the use of the canal is dependent upon the observance of the rules we prescribe is plainly set forth in the treaty. It is evident that we would make no such agreement with a foreign power as to our own vessels over which we have authority and can punish them directly for offenses; but the regulations are for other nations only, over whose vessels we do not have authority and can punish in an indirect manner by denying them the use of the canal.

The question really at issue is not whether the United States can permit any of its own vessels to pass through the canal free of tolls, but whether the United States, after having exempted some of its own vessels, can exact tolls from English vessels during the time that England observes these rules.

It can not be held, in my opinion, from any legitimate construction of the words of the treaty, or from the diplomatic history of the construction of the canal, that the words "all nations" were intended to include the United States.

Mr. Olney says:

The principle is well settled that a State conveys away its rights of sovereignty or property only in terms which are clear and express and are not susceptible of any other reasonable construction. If the terms are vague and of doubtful import, the presumption is against the State's intention to part with or abridge its jurisdictional or property rights.

Its purposes and views are completely defeated if the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is to be construed according to the British contention and the United States has lost the ordinary and normal right of a canal owner to be exempt from the tolls and charges it makes to customers.

When five out of the six rules stated in the treaty are conceded not to apply to the United States, what ground is there for the argument that the United States is included in the terms of the first rule and not in those of the other five, when nothing in the treaty so indicates? Great Britain has admitted that all the rules except rule 1 do not apply to the United States, and it seems preposterous to say that in some instances the United States shall be included and in others excluded, when it suits the interests of another nation to make such an interpretation. If the treaty does not apply to our vessels of war, it does not apply to our commercial vessels, for both have exactly the same status in the treaty and are referred to in exactly the same language in rule 1.

The rules do not apply to the United States, but are a declaration of the policy adopted by us to so regulate the use and to manage the canal under the authority reserved in article 2 of the treaty as to afford the free and open use of the canal to the vessels of all other nations, "observing these rules," on terms of equality as between them, and that the "conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable."

I can not conceive of a more generous policy than the one we have adopted. After building a canal on our own territory, at a public expense of $400,000,000, we intend to deal with equal justice with all nations, and to charge all alike a just and fair rate of tolls, including in this our own vessels engaged in foreign trade.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty is both a political and a commercial treaty. Great Britain does not complain that her public political rights have been abridged or impaired or that any of the attributes of her sovereignty are infringed. Her claim is that, under those provisions of the Panama Canal act which exempt our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls, and forbid any vessel engaged in the shipping of the United States to be acting in violation of our statutes against trusts and monopolies—her claim is that her vessels are discriminated against. None of her vessels can engage in the coastwise trade. And, as all vessels violating the antitrust and antimonopoly laws are excluded from the canal, her vessels are not discriminated against on that ground. What basis is there for her claim, even if we should admit what is not true—that the United States is included in the term "all nations" in rule 1? All the more, then, if we agree that the United States is not included in the term "all nations" in rule 1—which is the correct interpretation—is her claim without foundation.

In a treaty affecting the political rights of a nation an irreparable injury may be committed; its sovereignty, which involves its honor, standing, and credit among the nations of the earth, may be affronted, and if the affront be not redressed such nation will lose in prestige. But in this dispute no such question is involved so far as England is concerned. Speculative damages to her shipping interests are alone involved. No damage has yet occurred, because the canal is not yet open. If, when the canal is opened, such damages were suffered and she could prove their amount in some sum, and could further prove that such damages were suffered in violation of a treaty right, there would be a basis for her claim, and it would be a proper subject for arbitration at The Hague or elsewhere. But she has suffered no affront and her shipping no damage. Is this matter pressed upon us at this time because of the inopportune happening in Mexico or elsewhere of diplomatic complications which the administration has found it difficult to deal with, in the hope that our Government will make a valuable concession and step down from our rightful place over the control of the canal in order to avoid further international embarrassment? Has the measure of this administration been taken to the effect that an unfounded demand, made after the lapse of years, sugar-coated with much talk of peace and national honor, will be submitted to? I sincerely hope not. The national honor is not involved in not conceding anything to anyone at this time, but will be imperiled if the inherent rights of the American people are granted away because some other nation demands them of our Government. [Applause.]

The voice is the voice of Jacob, but the hand is the hand of Esau.

A nation foremost in importance in the world's affairs can not afford to yield to such pressure and concede now the rights we reserve to ourselves under the treaty. The essence of our prestige consists in resistance to such attempts to force our hand. As a Nation we should deal justly, observe our treaties, and keep our obligations. But there is just as much national honor involved in insisting upon our own just rights as in conceding their rights to others; and it seems to me that the American Government must always be bound to protect the welfare of the people of the United States and of its future generations from the standpoint of their rights and interests in perpetuity. Will not a surrender at this time of any right we have under the treaty convey it away forever?

I had intended to comment upon the economic questions involved in this dispute. The repeal of the free tolls to our coastwise ships will work disaster to the Pacific coast. That it will so do, I think no one disputes. Are not the interests and welfare of that great section of our country of as sacred concern at this time as the interest of any foreign nation? We have long borne the burden of costly transportation, and now, when relief is in sight, I am unwilling to surrender our agreed and just rights.

I had intended also to extend the quotations from American authorities and to include some from high English authorities who maintain the soundness and justice of the rights of our country as outlined in these remarks, but the time at my disposal will not permit.

The canal is a part of the coastal waters of the United States, a part of our coast line for all political and territorial purposes. We acquired its site by purchase; we provided the funds and brains for its conception and construction; we are responsible for its maintenance and operation. We might charge our coastwise vessels tolls, as a matter of domestic policy, but we do not have to do this at the instance of any other nation. If we charge them tolls, it will be a reversal of our whole national policy.

The treaty of December 22, 1815, between the United States and England provides:

No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States; nor in ports of any of his Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

The language appears to clearly and explicitly say that Great Britain must admit to her ports our ships on equal terms with her own, including those engaged in her coastwise trade; yet the port charges at Bristol, England, is 56 cents per ton on American vessels, while English coastwise vessels pay only 20 cents per ton as port charges; at Liverpool the American ships pay 33 cents per ton and the English coastwise ships pay only 9 cents per ton. In the case of the port charges at Bristol an American vessel of 5,000 tons burden would pay $1,800 more for each cargo than an English ship would, and in the port of Liverpool $1,200 more. It will not be necessary to multiply instances of such differences in favor of coastwise ships, both here and in England, and against which no complaint has ever been made in nearly 100 years. It never was understood that the coastwise trade of a nation was included in the provisions of treaties. Such trade is purely the domestic concern of each country.

Where certain words and phrases have been used in treaties and have acquired by practice a definite meaning, such or similar words or phrases occurring in a subsequent treaty are understood to be used in the sense they have acquired under the former treaty. If there is a different practice intended, it is incumbent upon the nation desiring the change either to so define the meaning to be given to the words in the new treaty as to change the practice, or to use wholly dissimilar words and phrases whose purport effects a change in the practice.

This very question was before the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Olsen against Smith, One hundred and ninety-fifth United States, page 332, which was decided on November 28, 1904.

The syllabus statement of the law in interpreting the following language of the treaty of 1815 that—

No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States—

Is—

A State pilotage law subjecting all vessels, domestic and foreign, engaged in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, but which exempts pursuant to law coastwise steam vessels of the United States, is not in conflict with provisions in the treaty between the United States and Great Britain to the effect that British vessels shall not be subject to any higher or other charges than vessels of the United States.

The decision was rendered by Justice White, now the Chief Justice, in this plain and explicit language:

Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage, resulting from the law of the United States, nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law, concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and, therefore, any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of vessels of the United States in such trade.

The language of the treaty of 1815 is more definite and emphatic than the following language of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

It thus clearly appears from the practice of the two nations under the treaty of 1815, and from the decision of our Supreme Court, that the coastwise trade of each nation was a matter for each nation to regulate as it chose, and was not included within the scope or operations of treaties made for the regulation of charges or tolls on commerce.

The English publication Law Magazine and Review for November, 1912, says:

If England for a moment believed that the words "British vessels" or "vessels of the United States" as used in the treaty of 1815 included or was ever intended to include coasting vessels, she would not have established and enforced differential rates at her various ports in favor of coasting vessels, for that would then be a flagrant violation of the rights secured to vessels of the United States under the treaty. Not only this, but such an interpretation on the part of England would afford the United States to justly demand that vessels of the United States pay the same dues and charges at British ports as are exacted from British vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, instead of those largely increased and heavier dues and charges that American vessels have to pay.

But, in addition to this, Great Britain, by assent and ratification under circumstances similar to those that have arisen under the Panama Canal act, is not in a position to now insist on an interpretation of the equality clause of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty different from that in accordance with the established interpretation she herself has put upon the treaty of 1815 and of like clauses in other treaties.

When rule 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, quoted above, was being prepared the treaty of 1815 had been in force for 86 years. If England had at that time intended that our coastwise shipping should be included in the provisions of rule 1, she should have demanded in express terms the abrogation of existing practice under the treaty of 1815, and an express reference to our coastwise trade in the treaty, and that such trade should pay the same tolls as other trade. But not having had our coastwise vessels definitely included in the terms of the treaty and the practice of 86 years expressly abrogated, she is now estopped from demanding a construction of the treaty that will so do. In the rules we propose a just and generous use of the canal to all nations on terms of equality among them; but under the treaty what we shall charge our own vessels is our own affair, and this is especially true of our coastwise traffic.

I make these remarks from a profound conviction of the rightfulness of the American case and that our justification is complete. I would not be understood as having any purpose of fomenting discord or stirring up resentment. There is more in the present crisis than meets the eye. Great Britain has always been a stalwart protector of the commercial interests of her people, as well as of her national prestige and honor. I am appealing to you, my fellow Representatives, that we, in storm as well as sunshine, likewise bravely stand by the interests and welfare of our people and our country's prestige and honor.

I marvel that any administration, no matter how hard pressed, in view of our illustrious history and the patriotic defense we have always made of the rights of all the western world, as well as our own, would commend that we now diminish our prestige and yield, right or wrong. Why should we yield if right, as I fully believe we are? I appeal to you to come to the aid of country and, regardless of party, save the administration from making an irreparable mistake. We have undertaken to build an American canal at Panama under American control. It is nearly ready for operation. Let this glorious achievement be the occasion for a courageous insistence on the rights of our country.

No one has suffered any injury so far, nor will within the immediate future. So vital a question should come to us on its merits and not be associated with inferred diplomatic difficulties arising out of totally different questions. We are asked to act practically in the dark, so far as reasons for reversing our national policy are concerned.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the people of the United States, as well as we who are their representatives, should know what great disaster, if any, threatens our country that would justify us in surrendering any of our rights—"right or wrong." Possibly the entanglements our distinguished President hints at would lose some of their seeming seriousness if laid open to the light of day. Our people have a great and brave heart. In times past they have freely given their money and their lives when it was left to them to defend the national prestige and the honor of the flag. I do not suppose a conflict to be impending; yet all information as to the matters of "greater delicacy and nearer consequence" is locked in the breasts of a few. What lies behind the curtain at which they are so alarmed? No sufficient reasons for the repeal have been advanced, and every consideration of sound public policy and national self-respect demand that we maintain our just rights, and, free from any attempted direction by any foreign power, legislate for our national interests as we may think will best promote the public good. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Does the gentleman from California have further speakers?

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY].

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the fact that President Woodrow Wilson was elected by the suffrage of a plurality of the voters, no man was ever inaugurated President of the United States who was held in higher personal esteem than he. Regardless of party affiliation he possessed the good will of the people and they honestly desired that his administration should be a successful one. He was for many months subjected to less criticism by the newspapers and his political opponents than had any President who had preceded him at the commencement of their terms, with the possible exception of President Monroe. Members of Congress refrained from criticising his foreign and domestic policies, even though they may have been opposed to his foreign policy as unforceful and endangering our influential position in international affairs, particularly as they affect our own interests on the American continents, and opposed to his domestic policy as being economically fundamentally unsound. Everyone wanted as little friction as possible, as the people were adjusting themselves to the new conditions caused by the sudden and violent changes in business readjustments and employments of the people caused by his economic domestic policies, and we, not of his party, hoped against hope that his lack of a definite foreign policy would not result in entangling and detrimental foreign alliances and complications before he could either develop one of his own or would accept the diplomatic policy developed by his predecessor, and under which this Government had during recent years occupied a position of international power and influence, maintained the honor, and protected the welfare of the Nation. I realize with sincere regret that our hopes were doomed to disappointment.

The most humiliating duty of my life was listening to the President of the United States ignore his publicly uttered preelection opinion, repudiate a fundamental plank in the platform of his party, on which he was elected and to which he unqualifiedly subscribed, and instruct Congress to stultify itself and repeal the section of the law granting free tolls to American coastwise shipping using the Panama Canal, thus definitely acknowledging to the world that this country has surrendered the moral and, under international law, long and firmly established legal right of every nation to exercise absolute sovereignty over its coastwise shipping commerce. The President delivered his instructions in a few didactic sentences, but his message contained no explanation of his change of mind on this most important subject and gave Congress no facts to sustain his position and no reason other than his personal command to reverse itself.

In all of the President's writings, including his messages to Congress, he used terse and classical English, which proves that he knows the meaning and value of the words of our language.

There has been no change in the English language recently. The words and the sentences in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty mean exactly the same to-day as they did when Congress, after mature deliberation, included the provision in the act and when Mr. Woodrow Wilson as a candidate for President of the United States was positive that within the meaning of that treaty Congress had the right without violating treaty obligations to exempt our coastwise ships from paying canal tolls. I wonder what influence has caused this change to come over the spirit of his dreams since his election to the Presidency. It may be that the shortage of railroad freight due to the paralysis of trade caused by the economic policies of the administration has appealed to him and that, in addition to permitting the railroads to increase their freight rates to make up for the shortage, he intends to minimize water competition with the transcontinental railroads. Or it may be accounted for as a state of mind due to his unique and peculiar temperament and to his scholastic training and habits of thought. Comparing his present-day papers and utterances with his past writings and speeches demonstrates that the President has frequently changed his mind on many fundamental principles of government. Or the change may be attributable to the insidious, subtle, malignant influence and pressure of British diplomacy.

While the President was delivering his message to Congress the Secretary of State sat in the diplomatic gallery of the House, smiling, nodding approval, and applauding, evidently for the moment forgetting that the Democratic platform adopted at Baltimore contained the words: "We favor exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal," and that every sentence in the Baltimore platform was written or approved by him; that not a word or punctuation mark was inserted in that platform without being first submitted to and indorsed by him. The presidential nominee was undoubtedly correct when he said, "That platform was not molasses to catch flies." Certainly it was not. But if not, what was it, in the present opinion of the President, so far as this particular plank is concerned?

If Congress concedes to the President on the free-tolls proposition it may not be long before some foreign country may object to our fortifying the canal, contending that under the treaty we are only permitted to police it, and when that point is conceded by a complacent President and a subservient Congress, some other nation may object to the ships of our Navy using the canal toll free, and another nation may raise the point that the neutralization of the canal means that it can only be used as a neutral port by our Navy in the event that our country should become engaged in a foreign war.

The adoption of the toll amendment recommended by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce will result in the ships of our Navy being compelled to pay tolls. The action of the committee was taken without any formal protest having been made—so far as the House possesses knowledge on the subject—against our ships of war passing through the canal toll free.

The Panama Canal Zone was made habitable and healthy by American scientists. The canal was planned and its construction supervised by American engineers, and the expert work on it was done by American mechanics. It was built on American soil by the American Government with American money primarily for the benefit of the American people, but it was also, by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty with Great Britain, neutralized for the shipping of the nations of the world on terms of equality so far as use and tolls are concerned. No nation questions the fact that the United States possesses the plenary governmental power of sovereignty in the Canal Zone, or that it owns the canal and has the authority and right to fix and collect just and equitable tolls on shipping going through the canal. We have recognized our treaty obligations by placing American ships engaged in the general carrying trade of the world's commerce on the same footing as foreign ships, only exempting our ships in the coastwise trade, they not coming into competition with foreign ships. The Canal Zone is as much a part of the United States as is Alaska or the District of Columbia. It is an integral part of our coastwise shipping route. We have the inherent right, which right was not abrogated by the treaty, to pass laws for the government and control of and to permit to pass through the canal free of toll our coastwise interstate shipping. By doing so we are not injuring the shipping of any foreign country.

Since 1817 no ship flying a foreign flag has been permitted to engage in our domestic coastwise shipping commerce. With the exception of our Navy and our ships engaged in our coastwise trade, all foreign and American ships will be charged the same rate of tolls. Exempting our coastwise vessels from tolls will not increase the tolls on foreign ships. Collecting tolls on our coastwise ships would not decrease the tolls to be collected on foreign ships.

If the exemption from tolls of our coastwise ships is in conflict with the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, that section of the law is null and void and of no effect. Why not have the Supreme Court pass on the question? Is it because the question has been practically passed on and decided in the case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 332)?

The opinion in this case was written by Mr. Justice White, now Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, and declared that a British vessel engaged in foreign commerce was not entitled under the treaty of 1815 from the exemption from paying pilotage accorded by the law of the State of Texas to American vessels engaged in the coastwise trade. The decision involved the judicial interpretation of the second article of that treaty, which is as follows:

> No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States, nor in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.
> This treaty was to be obligatory for 4 years from its ratification, but it was extended for 10 years by the convention of October 20, 1818, and indefinitely extended by the convention of August 6, 1827, so that it is a subsisting treaty to-day.

In the course of the judgment rendered by Mr. Justice White he said:

> Nor is there merit in the contention that as the vessel in question was a British vessel coming from a foreign port the State laws concerning pilotage are in conflict with a treaty between Great Britain and the United States providing that no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States. Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage resulting from the law of the United States nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by State laws concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemption does not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in such trade. In substance the proposition but asserts that because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations, therefore there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even although such regulations apply without discrimination to all vessels in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign. (Olsen v. Smith, 195 U. S., 332.)
> Not only has this interpretation of the treaty of 1815 been adopted and carried into practice by Great Britain for nearly a century, thus giving it the same validity as though a clause exempting coastwise trade had been therein inserted, but England's continued silence and acquiesence and failure to object to a like interpretation by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case cited is in itself an implied ratification and adoption thereof and is equivalent in its consequences to an express declaration of approval.
> If, therefore, the words "British vessels" and "vessels of the United States," as used in the treaty of 1815, do not include vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, as I feel has been sufficiently demonstrated, it is difficult to understand how the words "vessels of commerce of all nations," as used in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, does include them.

England has always carried out the same policy as that of the United States with reference to her coastwise vessels, either by safeguarding her home trade diplomatically in express exemptions in treaties or by subjecting her coastwise vessels to other and different dues and charges from vessels engaged in the over-seas trade, thus practically discriminating in favor of her own domestic marine.

In principle the two things are the same, the result being that the stranger coming from over the seas, in spite of all the pretense of uniformity, mutuality, and equality of treatment, has to pay larger and heavier port dues than the British coastwise vessel, and this is the practice at British ports to-day, as it has always been, even in spite of the most formal treaty stipulations to the contrary. While to-day England's coastwise trade is open to ships of other nations, yet this was not always so, for at one time it was provided by law that no goods or passengers should be carried coastward from one port of the United Kingdom to another except in British ships, the same act defining what the coastwise trade was, and as late as in 1870 it was provided by act of Parliament that no goods or passengers should be carried by water from one port of Canada to another except in British ships. The whole history of English diplomacy has been uniform with that of the United States and other commercial countries either in specifically exempting coastwise trade from its conventions and treaties or by doing so in establishing different and other duties and charges for her coastwise marine than those imposed at the same ports on vessels engaged in the over-seas trade.

It appears that the United States has expressly excepted its coastwise trade in 31 treaties with other commercial countries, while Great Britain, on her part, has also solemnly and diplomatically made the same reservation in 31 treaties with foreign nations, so that no fewer than 47 commercial countries among the international federation of friendly powers of the world have by treaty pronounced themselves in favor of the inviolability of home or coastwise trade from foreign intrusion; and those countries that have not so formally expressed themselves have by their local laws or immemorial custom tenaciously declined to place their coasting vessels on an equality with or in the same category as foreign vessels. This right of a nation to dominate over its own domestic maritime trade has been of such constant and unquestioned recognition that it has become practically a principle of the law of nations. The usage of nations is the best guide in the interpretation of treaties, and if one takes this as evidence of how the treaty-making powers of the world have accepted and understood the terms "vessels of commerce of nations," or "vessels," it becomes evident that they have never in a single instance been regarded as referring to or including any vessels but those engaged in the over-seas commerce and as not embracing the coasting trade. All nations have joined in establishing this principle and have insisted in perpetuating it, many under express treaty stipulations, while those nations who have not thus formally recorded their approval of the doctrine have nevertheless done so tacitly, and by themselves either by adopting laws to this effect or by applying other and different duties and charges to vessels engaged in foreign commerce than to those following the coastwise trade.

It may be argued that these treaty provisions specifically exempting coastwise vessels are evidence that Great Britain and the United States in omitting them in their treaties thereby recognized that the treaties between these countries included both foreign and coastwise vessels, but such an argument is without merit, because the fact exists to-day, as it has for generations, that England herself discriminates in favor of her own vessels engaged in the coasting trade.

The foregoing comments on the Olsen v. Smith case and its application to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and the British protest against canal-toll exemption of American coastwise ships I have quoted from an able and carefully prepared article written by Mr. C. A. Hereshoff-Bartlett, L. L. B., in which he maintains the legal and moral right of the United States to exempt its coastwise ships from paying the canal tolls. The article was published in the November, 1912, number of the London Law Magazine and Review. In the same number of that journal Mr. Edward S. Cox-Sinclair, in an exhaustive and learned article, also upholds the position of the United States. He concludes his article as follows:

To sum up, it is reasonably arguable—
(a) That the United States can support its action on the precise words of the material articles of the treaty; that its case is strengthened by reference to the preamble and context; and that its case is difficult to challenge on grounds of general justice;
(b) That there is no international obligation to submit the construction of its legislative act to any process of arbitration; and
(c) That any aggrieved party has an appropriate, an impartial, and a competent tribunal in the Supreme Court of the United States.

Both Mr. Hereshoff-Bartlett and Mr. Cox-Sinclair are recognized not only in Great Britain but throughout the world as authorities on international law.

I have heard it contended that should Congress refuse or fail to concede to the British protest and repeal the free-toll provision we would be forced under the provisions of the treaty of April 4, 1908, to submit the question to The Hague for arbitration, and would lose, as the representatives of all other nations are against us. I do not believe it to be true that all other nations side with England in her unjust protest. But, true or not, the question is not one that comes within the purview of the treaty as demanding its submission to The Hague, but is, on the contrary, one that is exempted by an express provision in the treaty from requiring such submission. That section of the treaty reads as follows:

Differences which may arise of a legal nature or relating to the interpretation of treaties existing between the two contracting parties and which it may not have been possible to settle by diplomacy, shall be referred to the permanent court of arbitration established at The Hague by the convention of the 29th of July, 1899, provided, nevertheless, that they do not affect the vital interests, the independence, or the honor of the two contracting States, and do not concern the interests of third parties.

The protest is made by Great Britain and concerns the United States alone and no third or other nation. It is a question involving our treatment of our coastwise ships engaged in interstate domestic commerce in which foreign ships are not permitted to engage; it affects the vital interests, the independence, and the honor of the United States, and we are not therefore under either moral or treaty obligations to arbitrate it.

It would seem that the right of the United States to exempt its coastwise shipping from the canal tolls is so plain that the President, to accomplish his undivulged purpose, found it necessary to instruct Congress to stultify itself and humiliate the Nation, but he did not deign to include in his remarkable message any reasons as to why such an undignified surrender of our rights should be made.

I, for one, will not sit quietly by and without protest permit the United States to be made a British province by the ipse dixit of the President.

Some foreign Governments subsidize their merchant marine. We do not subsidize ours. Russia reimburses its merchant ships for tolls paid for passing through the Suez Canal, and no protest by any Governmert has been made against that practice. Subsidized ships and ships that will be reimbursed by their government for tolls collected will use the Panama Canal without protest from this or any other nation. Spain has already passed such a law. And shall we permit a false meaning to be read into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and cravenly surrender our right to legislate as we please for our own ships on our own coasts? The idea is preposterous. The submission of an American President and an American Congress to such a false interpretation by a foreign Government is almost unthinkable.

Our Government should faithfully live up to and keep the letter and spirit of its treaty obligations, but it should not permit the meaning of one sentence in a treaty to be twisted to its detriment by any foreign Government, potentate, or power.

The protest of Great Britain against the exemption from tolls by the United States of her coastwise vessels is based on two principal grounds: First, that the exemption is inconsistent with the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that the canal shall be open to all nations on terms of entire equality, and secondly, that the exemption of American coastwise vessels would inevitably tend to increase the charges on all other vessels using the canal to the disadvantage of all other nations in comparison with the United States.

Neither objection is well taken, and neither Great Britain nor the President has offered or attempted to offer any statistics, reasons, or arguments to sustain either. The first objection is based on the sentence in the treaty which reads as follows:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality.

I have, I believe, conclusively shown that this section does not apply to our coastwise ships; but if it is held to apply to our interstate-commerce ships, it also applies to our Navy, and not even British diplomacy has as yet contended that it applies to our ships of war.

The second objection is nothing but an arbitrary ex parte assertion, without any attempt being made to support it with facts. It may be answered by the statement that the collection or the noncollection of tolls on our coastwise shipping will neither increase nor decrease the tolls that will be collected from other shipping, as the tolls have been fixed at $1.20 per net ton, not to be increased to more than $1.25 per net ton.

England's objection may be induced by her anxiety to protect her South American commercial interests from competition with this country, or it may be she believes that without the advantage of toll exemption American goods manufactured in our Atlantic States will not be able to compete with British goods in our Pacific States market, and that incidentally the development of manufacturing industries on the Pacific coast will be discouraged. But I think her real, though unexpressed, objection is twofold: First, to help the Canadian railways and Canadian commerce; second, to discourage American capital and American enterprise from turning its attention to the sea, fearing that the United States may again become a great maritime power and contest with her the supremacy of the ocean.

We have exempted these tolls in the interest of low freight rates on our interstate waterway commerce and to keep interstate railway freight rates down to a minimum. As a further effort in that direction we have denied free tolls to railroad-owned ships and have said to the transcontinental railroads, "Hands off the Panama Canal," and it is the expressed intention of the chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries to report a bill to the House placing the shipping of the United States engaged in the interstate carrying trade under the authority and jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, so far as passenger and freight rates are concerned. This will insure the benefit of free tolls going to the shippers and not to the ship and navigation companies.

Neither Great Britain nor any other non-American Government could own, dig, or operate the Panama Canal. The Monroe doctrine would estop them from doing so, and that doctrine was suggested by Mr. George Canning, the minister of foreign affairs of Great Britain, in 1823, to Mr. Richard Rush, the American minister to the British Court. The immediate purpose of its promulgation by President Monroe was to prohibit and prevent the consummation of the intention of the Holy Alliance to assist Spain to resubjugate and then to partition among themselves the revolted Spanish-American colonies. England's interest in maintaining the independence of the Latin-American Republics was not altruistic. She had then, as she has now, an extensive trade with those countries, and if they should be resubjugated by the mother country, it would be a severe blow to her commerce, so she diplomatically used the patriotism and love of liberty of the people of the United States to help her protect and maintain her South American trade.

The so-called Monroe doctrine was delivered to Congress by President Monroe in his annual message December 2, 1823. The sum and substance of that doctrine is contained in one sentence, as follows:

> We owe it therefore to candor and to the amicable relations existing between these powers and the United States to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere, but with the governments that have declared their independence and maintained it, whose independence we have on great consideration and just principles acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them or controlling in any other manner their destiny by any European power in any other light than as manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States.

Which is the language of diplomacy for saying it would be considered a just cause for war.

That message ended European conquest, acquisition of territory, and colonization on the American Continents.

President Polk, elucidating the doctrine, in his annual message of December 2, 1845, declared that while existing rights of all European nations should be respected, it was—> distinctly announced to the world as our settled policy that no future European colony or dominion shall with our consent be planted or established on the North American Continent.

The Monroe doctrine was invoked by President Cleveland in the Great Britain-Venezuela boundary question on December 17, 1895. He said:

> If any European power, by an extension of its boundaries, takes possession of the territory of one of our neighboring republics against the will and in derogation of its rights, it would be regarded as dangerous to our peace and safety.

President Roosevelt in his message to Congress December 3, 1901, said:

> The Monroe doctrine is a declaration that there must be no territorial aggrandizement by any non-American power at the expense of any American power on American soil. It is in no wise intended as hostile to any nation in the Old World. This doctrine has nothing to do with the commercial relations of any American power save that it in truth allows each of them to form such as it desires. We do not guarantee any State against punishment if it misconducts itself, provided that punishment does not take the form of acquisition of territory by any non-American power.

The Monroe doctrine is generally recognized by the nations as a principle of American policy. It has been accepted by Great Britain from the date of its promulgation; it was observed by Germany in her trouble with Venezuela in 1901–2; and it has by unanimous consent been spread on the minutes of The Hague Conference.

But, Mr. Speaker, the Monroe doctrine does not require the United States to police the Americas or act as a bad-debt collector. Neither does it impose on us the duty of maintaining peace and order or a stable government in our sister Republics. It does not prohibit a European country from waging a just war against an American Republic, nor does it require the United States to intervene in the event of such a war being declared. But it does mean that no European or other non-American Government shall acquire American territory as the result of such a war or otherwise. Great Britain could not have built the canal without acquiring American territory. Under the Monroe doctrine she could not have acquired it.

The policies and achievements of the President certainly can not be viewed with satisfaction and commendation by his political adherents. He made a failure of the tariff act, even from a Democratic standpoint, by interjecting himself into the situation and forcing the Ways and Means Committee to accept his views instead of the views of the men of his party on that committee who had practical experience and possessed expert and technical knowledge of the subject. He made a failure of the banking and currency act, so far as the bill as it originally passed the House is concerned, although many of the crudities of the House bill were amended out of it in the Senate, not because the President wished the House bill to be amended but because the Senate would not pass it without amending it so as to make it workable and in a degree effective.

His experimental diplomacy has proven to be a failure. When he was inaugurated as President our diplomatic relations with all the world were friendly, influential, and dignified. To-day they are unfriendly, ineffective, and ridiculous. I wonder if his "watchful-waiting" policy of treating the Mexican situation has resulted in producing embarrassing international complications, and that his unexplained change of mind on the exemption of our coastwise ships from the canal tolls and his orders to Congress to stultify itself on that question is a last desperate attempt to extricate himself from an exceedingly unpleasant and entangled diplomatic dilemma.

In the last paragraph of his message the President asks Congress "to repeal that provision of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, which exempts vessels of the United States engaged in the coastwise trade from the payment of the tolls," in the following remarkable language:

> I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequences if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

I was amazed at the utterance. It was the first time in many months that I had heard the administration accused of having a foreign policy, and the request of the President has not convinced me that it has. His astounding statement that unless Congress ungrudgingly complies with his advice and accedes to the insufferable demand of Great Britain he will not know what to do, I take for granted to be true, but regret he thought it necessary to make the admission.

Hypocritical, pharisaical, phylactery-wearing Albion. Always diplomatically punishing some nation for that nation's benefit. You can assume an air of sanctimonious innocence and virtue and deceitfully appear to display an unselfish, disinterested interest in the advancement of mankind, to the sacrifice of your material welfare. Surely British diplomacy is something wonderful to contemplate. It beat us out of the St. Lawrence River, the intervening territory, and half of the Great Lakes, with the exception of Lake Michigan, by the treaty of peace at the close of the Revolutionary War. It beat us out of what we fought for in the War of 1812, and kept all reference to the right of search of merchantmen and the word "impressment" out of the treaty of Ghent. It beat us out of the territory lying between the forty-ninth parallel and 54° 40′ north in the Oregon Territory boundary settlement. Polk's campaign cry was, "Fifty-four-forty or fight," but British diplomacy fixed the boundary at the forty-ninth parallel just the same, and there was no fight; and on the western coast we dropped the line south and gave her half of the Strait of Juan de Fuca and of the island of Vancouver. It has gotten the best of us in all of our fisheries treaties, and now, after England has kindly permitted us to spend $400,000,000 of our own money in digging the Panama Canal, the pressure of British diplomacy has induced the President of the United States to change his mind and send to Congress the most remarkable state paper ever written, advising the legislative branch of the Government to surrender its legal and moral right under the law of nations to pass our own interstate coastwise commerce toll free through our own canal dug on our own soil.

Will Congress obey the President? I hope not. We are not compelled to give way to Great Britain in order to gain or retain her support and friendly offices in our international relations with other countries. Her immense volume of trade with the United States makes such a course by her necessary in the interest of her material business welfare, and then, again, Canada is closer and more friendly to the United States than the Philippines are to Japan.

The President is an exceedingly erudite, well-meaning, kindly, polished gentleman, more highly educated and possessing more knowledge, if not more wisdom, than any of his predecessors. During the short time he has occupied the presidential chair it has been demonstrated conclusively that it is one of the most easy of intellectual efforts for a scholastic idealist to dream dreams, evolve theories, and in imagination govern the world from a philosopher's chair, but that when it comes to dealing with flesh and blood, human nature, economic conditions, and national and international problems as they are it is an entirely different proposition. It is not dreams and theories but facts and conditions that must be considered, not abstract philosophy but concrete wisdom that must be used to effectively govern a people in such a manner as to surely safeguard their rights and liberties and advance their prosperity at home, and to protect the national welfare and maintain the dignity, honor, and power of the Commonwealth abroad. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. If nobody wants to speak——

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly willing to vote, but I have promised some time to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON], and I yield to him 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this bill. I have been opposed to free tolls from the beginning, and two years ago when the question was before the House I made two speeches against it. I congratulate the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce upon their stand. Had we followed their lead two years ago we would not now be occupying the ridiculous attitude that we now do before the world. I congratulate the President upon his stand for national honor, and the Democratic Party upon this, its somewhat unwilling reversal of its position. I modestly consider myself indorsed. I am reminded of the story of the lawyer who, having argued a case in the Supreme Court of the United States which was decided in his favor, was called upon by some of his friends and informed of his victory, said: "So the Supreme Court decided in my favor and sustained my contention, did they? Well, all I have to say is that I still think I was right."

In spite of this sudden and unexpected support of the Democratic Party, I still think I am right. [Applause.]

By the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850 the United States and Great Britain agreed that neither should build a transisthmian canal without the consent and cooperation of the other. To get rid of this limitation and get the independent right to build and operate the canal we negotiated the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which is as follows:

ARTICLE 1.

The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

ARTICLE 2.

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ARTICLE 3.

The United States adopts as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service. Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents, and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

ARTICLE 4.

It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

ARTICLE 5.

The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London at the earliest possible time within six months from the date hereof.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty and thereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate at Washington, the 18th day of November, in the year of Our Lord one thousand nine hundred and one.

JOHN HAY. [SEAL.]
PAUNCEFOTE. [SEAL.]

The controversy all turns on the meaning of the words "all nations," in the first paragraph of article 3. It is a good rule of law that words that are plain and free from ambiguity have no need of interpretation; yet volumes have been written on the subject of what these simple words mean and to show that they do not mean what they say.

I want to state things fairly. I want to treat everybody with consideration and respect. That is one of the rules of debate in this House. And yet, I am bound to say that some of the gentlemen who adroitly assume that they alone are on the side of their country; that those opposed to them are advocating the cause of another power, and even question the loyalty and patriotism of the President, and have sought to blind reason by appealing to national passion and prejudice, have basely and disgracefully abused the gift of eloquence and the art of advocacy, an offense for which they will in due time have to answer at the bar of an enlightened public opinion.

The argument is as follows: Although the treaty plainly says "vessels of commerce and of war of all nations," this does not include vessels engaged in the "coastwise trade," because the laws of the United States (Rev. Stats., sec. 4347) absolutely prohibit the carrying of any merchandise or passenger from one port in the United States to another port in the United States in any foreign vessel whatsoever, and therefore there can be no competition between American coastwise vessels and foreign vessels.

You have heard it stated over and over again by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and others that coastwise vessels were engaged in domestic trade and therefore there would be no competition between them and English vessels. [Applause.] That is the argument. Now, let us see. This trade, it is said, being wholly reserved to vessels of the United States, it can be no concern of any foreign Government whether we pass them free through the canal or not. We did not exempt American vessels engaged in the foreign trade from canal tolls for the reason that we admit that these vessels do compete with foreign vessels, and consequently such a discrimination would be a violation of the treaty. So it will be seen that our whole case turns upon the question of the existence or nonexistence of competition between our coastwise ships and the ships under foreign flags. This leads us to consider the coastwise trade and the laws with reference thereto, as distinguished from other navigation.

Does it not seem strange that two great nations should engage in a controversy, that might lead to serious results, over a matter that relates to the internal domestic affairs of one and does not concern the other? If it be true, as stated here, that this so-called coastwise commerce does not concern Great Britain and the outside world, why should Great Britain want to meddle with it? You are perfectly right when you say that in the domestic affairs of this Nation we are not to tolerate the interference of other nations, but the question is, Is this that kind of a commerce? [Applause.] I say no. Why? Because it partakes of the nature of international commerce. To make this plain it will be necessary to review and bear in mind the history and legislation with respect to this subject.

The laws restricting domestic commerce wholly to domestic vessels and prohibiting vessels not built here of domestic materials and wholly owned by citizens of the United States from flying the American flag were enacted in 1817, soon after the close of the War of 1812, and came in response to a general sentiment in favor of protection to all American industry. Manufactures were protected by tariff duties, and shipbuilding and navigation by an absolute exclusion of all foreign competition. This was the beginning of the "American system," under which the country became the richest and most powerful nation in the world. Under this protection our domestic or coastwise merchant marine has developed so that, next to the British, we have the greatest merchant marine afloat. Of course we could not by law protect American foreign-going ships from competition, for the ocean is the free highway of the world, and the consequence is that our ships have largely been crowded out of that trade by the cheaper-built ships and cheaper labor of other countries. In recognition of this disadvantage the ocean mail subsidy act of 1891, which allows mail compensation of 66 cents to $4 per mile, outward voyage, according to class of vessel, was passed, under which we have a few ships in the Atlantic and Pacific trade. During my first eight years in Congress there was a continuous demand on the part of shipbuilders and shipping interests to increase this subsidy to $4 per mile for vessels of the second class on the ground that it was justified on military reasons in order to obtain auxiliaries for our Navy, but Congress, through a combination of a minority of Republicans and a majority of Democrats, refused these demands. The opposition was based, not on the ground that our merchant marine in the foreign trade did not need help to be revived, but on the ground that the proposed help would be ineffectual. We have since then continually deplored the fact that 92 per cent of our exports and imports are carried in foreign bottoms and have been seeking a remedy. To equalize their cost with foreign vessels we lately provided for the importation free of all materials and articles used in their construction or equipment, and to equalize their wages we are about to pass the seamen's bill.

These vessels, owing to the fact that they have to meet the competition of the world upon the high seas, perhaps stand in need of the advantage that the subsidy of free tolls through the Panama Canal would give them. If we had the right under the treaty to do so, we should have exempted them instead of the coastwise shipping. But in admitting as we have by our action that American ships in the foreign trade must be treated the same in regard to tolls as the ships of commerce of any other nation, we have given away our whole case. The case, therefore, turns upon the existence or nonexistence of competition. If there is competition, either direct or indirect, between our coastwise ships and those of other flags through the canal, then our case is lost.

The word "coastwise" has undergone a change in meaning along with the expansion of our national domain. Originally "coastwise" meant along the coast. Vessels trading between England and Guernsey and Jersey have been held not to be coasting vessels. Sheppard v. Hill (11 Exch., 55). Alderson, B., in delivering the opinion of the court in the above case, said:

> A coasting vessel would seem to mean one that goes along the coast.

Goods brought from an Irish port to Bristol, England, were held not brought coastwise. Battersby v. Kirk (5 L. J. C. P., 166). In 1824 it was contended that the act of Congress relating to coastwise trade did not include a voyage begun in one State and ending in another, but Chief Justice Marshall overruled the point, saying:

> The act describes with minuteness the various operations of a vessel engaged in it, and it can not, we think, be doubted that a voyage from New Jersey to New York is one of those operations. Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., 214). See also North River Steamboat Co. v. Livingston (3 Cow., 713).

Congress has assumed to include or exclude ports within our domain in the coastwise trade at pleasure.

The act of June 1, 1872, exempted from payment of customs duty articles used by vessels employed in the foreign trade, "including trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States, provided that vessels receiving the benefit of this act shall not engage in the coastwise trade of the United States for more than two months in any one year," and it was held that a vessel which engaged in a voyage from the Atlantic to the Pacific ports of the United States of more than three months' duration was not in the coastwise trade, but in the foreign trade within the meaning of said act. United States v. Patten (Holmes (U. S.), 421).

Mr. MURDOCK. What date was that?

Mr. STEENERSON. I decline to yield. I refer to the report. In 1899 we included the Philippines in the coastwise trade, but repealed it because we lacked ships to do the business. Porto Rico and Hawaii are included, and Tutuila and Guam may be. We could possibly acquire a port in Europe, and our so-called coastwise ships would sail around the world. This confusion of ideas and terms leads many to draw a distinction between these two classes of ships, which, as concerns this question, does not exist. Calling a thing a name does not change its nature. We could, for instance in a tariff law, say that horses should be dutiable at a certain rate, and then say that within the meaning of this act the word "horses" shall include cattle and sheep, but this would not make horses out of cattle and sheep. The test is, What ships going through the canal will compete? In the British protest this is clearly pointed out. It says:

> The exemption will, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, be a violation of the equal treatment secured by the treaty, as it will put the "coastwise trade" in a preferential position as regards other shipping. Coastwise trade can not be circumscribed so completely that benefits conferred upon it will not affect vessels engaged in the foreign trade. To take an example, if cargo intended for a United States port beyond the canal, either from east or west, and shipped on board a foreign ship could be sent to its destination more cheaply, through the operation of the proposed exemption, by being landed at a United States port before reaching the canal, and then sent on as coastwise trade, shippers would benefit by adopting this course in preference to sending the goods direct to their destination through the canal on board foreign ships.
> Again, although certain privileges are granted to vessels engaged in an exclusively coastwise trade, His Majesty's Government are given to understand that there is nothing in the laws of the United States which prevents any United States ship from combining foreign commerce with coastwise trade, and consequently from entering into direct competition with foreign vessels while remaining "prima facie" entitled to the privilege of free passage through the canal. Moreover, any restriction which may be deemed to be now applicable might at any time be removed by legislation or even perhaps by mere changes in the regulations.

Take the case of a British ship loaded with lumber from British Columbia for New York, and an American "coastwise" ship loaded with a like cargo in a port in the State of Washington, and bound for the same place. One pays toll, say, at the rate of $1.50 per thousand feet, and the other passes free. If the owner of the lumber, however, instead of loading in a British port, had loaded in an American vessel in an American port across the line in the State of Washington, which he could do now without payment of duty, he would get his property through without payment of tolls. This would certainly be a discrimination in favor of the American ship. So a ship carrying 1,000 passengers, with a tonnage of 15,000, would have to pay $18,000 canal tolls if foreign, but could save that amount by unloading in a United States port near the canal and let a "coastwise" vessel take her passengers through to destination. Goods could be transhipped to avoid tolls, resulting not only in discrimination against foreign vessels, but in great loss of revenue to the United States.

We now come to the decisive and controlling point in the whole case, so far as the treaty is concerned and the point relied upon by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and others who take that side of the controversy. This point is that the words "all nations" in the treaty does not include the United States because, if they do, then our vessels of war would have to be treated, in case of war, the same as the vessels of belligerent or even hostile nations. In this behalf the gentleman, as appears from page 5626 of yesterday's RECORD, said:

> There is a more serious question involved in the passage of this bill. The right to discriminate in favor of our ships, the opportunity to encourage our shipping, and to increase our commerce are matters of vital importance, but they pale into insignificance when compared with the attack on the sovereignty of our country in the Canal Zone. [Applause.]
> We are told by those in favor of the pending bill that when the Hay-Pauncefote treaty used the words "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality" we are prevented from preferring our own vessels of commerce.
> But if the language applied to vessels of commerce, it must apply to vessels of war.
> It is manifest that under this claim of the treaty we can not exclude vessels of war and include vessels of commerce under our flag unless the words "all nations" means all nations other than ourselves, as it manifestly does. [Applause.]
> The power to build the canal, under our Constitution, rests in the war power of the United States. We built the canal primarily as an addition to our war power, as it permits the quicker transfer of our naval forces from one ocean to another. Its inland lake provides a harbor of refuge in which our navies can rendezvous and, as occasion offers, strike at either ocean.
> The advocates of Great Britain's claim take the position that we are forbidden to discriminate in favor of our own vessels of commerce; and as vessels of commerce and war are named together, how long will it be before the same advocate of the British contention will advise us that we can not discriminate in favor of our own war vessels?
> When you read sections, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 together, if no discrimination can be made in favor of our war vessels, we will be compelled to recognize the contention that if during war with a foreign power we find an enemy's man-of-war in the canal we can not drive it out, and if it leaves we must wait 24 hours before giving chase. If engaged in war, our own ships must chase themselves out of the canal in 24 hours.
> The contention of those advocating the British claim seems almost absurd when we recognize that if we admit them for vessels of commerce the same reasoning will require us to admit them for vessels of war.
> To do so would convert the canal in time of war into a liability instead of an asset. [Applause.]
> Of course, we made no such contract.

No; of course not. That is negatived by the clause in section 2, that this Government "shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such ownership and construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal," and the clause of section 3 conferring the right "to protect the canal against lawlessness and disorder," as well as the general principle conceded by all, that war with the United States when not otherwise provided "remits both parties to their original, natural right of self-defense, and gives the United States the right to close the canal against the other belligerent and to protect it and defend itself by whatever means might be necessary." But there is another answer to the contention, based upon universally recognized rules of law, which neither the gentleman from Alabama nor those who support him will dispute. The treaty is a law and must be construed as if it were a statute of the United States. The general words "vessels of war and of commerce of all nations observing these rules," while they do include merchant vessels, or "nationals," owned by private citizens of the United States, do not include vessels owned by, and which are the property of, the Government of the United States. This distinction has been persistently ignored by gentlemen on that side of the controversy, and results either from an intentional or accidental misuse of words that have different meanings when used in reference to different phases of the same subject. They say we built the canal and have the right to use it as we please, forgetting that it is not "they," but the whole people of the United States that have built the canal and maintain it, and who ought to be reimbursed by those who use the canal in their business for private gain in a reasonable charge for the service rendered.

To so construe the treaty as to permit or require the privately owned and operated merchant ships belonging to citizens of the United States to pass free of toll is in derogation of the rights, revenues, and prerogatives of the United States as the sovereign power. Toll exemption would be a direct loss to the revenues of the United States, and a proportional gain and bonus to the private citizens whose merchant ships go free. The rule of construction applicable to this clause of the treaty is as follows:

Where a statute is general, and thereby any prerogative, right, title, or interest is vested or taken from the King, in such case he shall not be bound, unless the statute is made by express words to extend to him. (Bacon's Abridgment, title Prerogative.)

This doctrine was adopted and fully approved by the United States Supreme Court in United States v. Knight (14 Pet. (U. S.), 301) and in United States v. Herron (20 Wal. (U. S.), 255), and these cases have been uniformly followed in all the courts since. The first case was decided in 1840, and was an action brought in Portland, Me., upon a bond to the United States, conditioned that the obligors should "continue true prisoners in the custody of the jailer within the limits of the jail yard" until a judgment was paid, and the local legislature enlarged the jail limits so as to extend them to the whole county. The alleged breach was that the prisoners had "escaped" over the original limits, and the court held that the law enlarging the limits, being in derogation of the prerogatives of the sovereign, did not include the United States, and sustained a recovery. The doctrine that the Government should not, unless named, be bound by an act of limitations is in accordance with that just cited from Bacon, because, if bound, it would be barred of a right. The court, in commenting on the rule and quoting from Bacon's Abridgment, was careful to explain (there were no doubt Anglophobiacs in those days) that the same principle had been decided elsewhere on the same ground—not upon any notion of prerogative, for even in England, where the doctrine is stated under the head of prerogative, this in effect means nothing more than that this exception is made from the statute for a public good, and the King represents the nation.

In another place it is said:

This is no invidious prerogative, but a rule founded on well-ascertained public policy necessary to protect the public interest against the negligence of public officers, and especially to guard the public revenue.

The Herron case was an action brought against a surety on a collector's bond, and the defendant pleaded in defense that under the bankruptcy act of Congress he had been discharged from "all debts and liabilities." Of course the words of the act "all debts and liabilities" were just as broad as the words "vessels of war and of commerce, and of all nations," in the treaty, and yet the court, "in view of the settled rule of construction that the sovereign authority of the country is not bound by words of a statute unless named therein," held that the discharge in bankruptcy from "all" debts was no defense.

The same question arose in 1907, under the Roosevelt administration, in the following manner: The Navy Department had for a long time been transporting coal in foreign bottoms from Atlantic to Pacific coast points for the use of the Navy, owing to the fact that in their judgment the charges for American bottoms were unreasonably high. In April, 1904, Congress passed an act to limit the authority of the Navy Department requiring—

That vessels of the United States, or belonging to the United States, and no others, shall be employed in the transportation by sea of coal, provisions, fodder, or supplies of any description, purchased pursuant to law, for the use of the Army or Navy of the United States, unless the President shall find that the rates of freight charges of said vessels are excessive and unreasonable, in which case the President shall make contracts under the law as it now exists.

There being no reasonable bids for American bottoms, the President submitted the question to the Attorney General "whether the prohibition contained in the Revised Statutes (sec. 4347) extends to merchandise which constitutes property owned by the Government." The Attorney General in replying held:

It is a well-settled principle of statutory construction that a prohibition of this character does not extend to or affect the sovereign, unless its language requires that such meaning shall be given to it.

And he quotes Bacon's Abridgment and the case above referred to. In the course of his opinion the Attorney General further says that the penalty for the violation of this statute is forfeiture of the property, and—forfeiture in such a case divests the title of the owner of the property forfeited and vests this title in the Government. If the merchandise subject to forfeiture already belongs to the Government, it is obvious that the proceeding would be altogether nugatory and futile. The Government would acquire by it title to something which it already owned, and the offender—that is to say, the United States itself—would be in precisely the same position in which it was prior to the infliction of the penalty. Under these circumstances it seems quite clear to me that, even without a resort to the rule of construction to which I have referred, the provisions of this law must be construed as inapplicable to merchandise owned by the United States. I answer, therefore, your first question in the negative, and advise you that, in my opinion, the provisions of section 4347, United States Revised Statutes, does not apply to property owned by the Government."

Under the act of 1904 the Attorney General held that to authorize the employment of foreign bottoms the President must find that the rates of freight charged by said vessels are excessive and unreasonable. This finding I will discuss later on, when considering another phase of the controversy.

Applying this universally recognized rule of construction we must come to the conclusion that the words "vessels of war and vessels of commerce of all nations," in article 3 of the treaty, "does not include vessels owned by and belonging to the United States," but does include "vessels of the United States," so called by reason of the navigation laws, but which, in fact, are vessels of commerce, owned by private individuals, engaged in trade for private profit, and which, by passing through the canal, come in competition with international commerce and in contact with carriers of merchandise of other nations. In other words, that, although the United States is excepted from the words, yet the exception is limited to the vessels actually owned and operated by the Government, which may be either vessels of war or vessels engaged in other Government service.

It will also be observed in the foregoing statute, relating to the same subject, which was passed in 1904, there is a distinction between these two kinds of vessels, for in the first line it is stated that "vessels of the United States or belonging to the United States, and no others, shall be employed," and so forth.

This is a congressional interpretation that differentiates "vessels of the United States," or our "nationals," from vessels owned by the United States.

FREE TOLLS ALSO A VIOLATION OF PANAMA TREATY.

It is not to Great Britain alone that we are bound. In our treaty with Panama—1903—in article 18, we agreed that the canal when constructed "shall be opened on the terms provided by section 1, article 3," of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, thus reaffirming to that Government our promise of equality of treatment to all. In article 19 of the same treaty we agree that the Republic of Panama—shall have the right to transport over the canal its vessels and its troops and munitions of war in such vessels at all times without paying charges of any kind.

Observe that this privilege is strictly limited to Panamanian Government vessels, and excludes Panamanian "nationals." Otherwise a large fleet of foreign owned and built merchant vessels could be collected under new and liberal Panamanian navigation laws to fly that flag and engage in international trade through the canal free while American vessels in the same trade paid tolls. I am therefore of the opinion that the toll-exemption clause is a violation of our treaty obligations, and for that reason should be repealed.

CHANGE OF SOVEREIGNTY NO CHANGE OF LAW.

The contention that because we have become either the absolute or qualified sovereign power on the Canal Zone we can do as we please and disregard the treaty is, in view of article 4, that—

No change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or of the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty—requires no refutation or comment. Neither does the assumption that all patriotism is on the side of free tolls and there is disloyalty on the other side. One should always dare to be true. "Nothing can need a lie." We are bound by the reason and judgment God has given us to use.

THE TOLL-EXEMPTION CLAUSE IS ECONOMICALLY UNWISE AND UNJUST TO THE TAXPAYERS OF THE UNITED STATES.

On August 22, 1912, while the conference report on the Panama Canal bill was before the House, I used this language:

But aside from the question of the treaty, and looking at it purely from the point of view of the public interest, I submit it is an unwise policy. It is economically unwise and ethically wrong.

Mature reflection has only strengthened this conclusion. Toll exemption is not in the interest of the people, the taxpayers of the United States, who have invested $375,000,000 in the enterprise, and who will have to pay annually a charge of about $20,000,000 to defend and operate it. This cry, "The canal is ours; we built it, and we have a right to do with it as we please," comes from special interests, who expect to profit by the exemption at the expense of the Treasury of the United States. They shrewdly seek to becloud the issue by raising all sort of unfounded claims. They say free tolls would be in the interest of all the people instead of at their expense for the enrichment of a few shipping combines and monopolists; that the railroads are fighting it, when they know that the railroads already control the ships; that repeal is subserviency to England, as if to do as we have agreed were a disgrace. Let us take up some of these contentions more in detail. The American people, not the shipowners, built the canal. It has already cost them $375,000,000, and before it is finished it will have cost $400,000,000. At 3 per cent the annual interest will amount to $12,000,000. The treaty with Panama requires us to pay $250,000 annually as rental; the cost of operating and maintenance and sanitation is estimated at $4,000,000, a sinking fund of $4,000,000, a total annual expense of nearly $20,000,000. The money invested has been or will be borrowed—necessarily an interest charge as above. Business prudence and political wisdom demand that the canal shall be self-supporting, provided returns large enough to enable the canal to carry itself can be secured without unwisely restricting traffic or limiting its usefulness. This principle was advocated by President Taft in his message of December 21, 1911, in which it is stated:

I believe that the cost of such a Government work as the Panama Canal ought to be imposed gradually but certainly upon the trade which it creates and makes possible. So far as we can, consistent with the development of the world's trade through the canal and the benefit which it was intended to secure to the east and west coastwise trade, we ought to labor to secure from the canal tolls a sufficient amount ultimately to meet the debt which we have assumed and to pay the interest.

Our Government service is constantly expanding, and so are the taxes. It is our duty, so far as practicable, to make Government enterprises like this self-sustaining, the same as is wisely required of the Postal Service. The canal will shorten the average voyage from the Atlantic to the Pacific coasts of the United States more than 8,000 miles. New York to San Francisco via Magellan is 13,581 miles, as against 5,285 miles via the canal. Is it not fair that those who derive immediate benefit from the canal should return to the Government a portion of the profit secured from using it?

It was shown at the hearings before the Committee on Commerce that the American-Hawaiian Steamship Co., which has 18 large freight steamers now in the service, pay one-third of their receipts to the Tehuantepec Railroad for carrying their freight across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, 190 miles, where it is reloaded on ships bound for New York. Mr. Dearborn, the president of the company, testified that the transit cost on the average $3.50 per ton, besides 10 days' delay. The next day he revised his testimony and said he had computed it and that $3 per ton was more nearly the correct amount. This company started out carrying Hawaiian sugar to New York via Magellan, but abandoned that route on the above terms. This shows the value of the canal route. The toll is $1.20 per net ton, which means 100 cubic feet of cargo space in a vessel. A commodity like sugar is so heavy that 2½ tons are carried in that space, and $1.20 per net ton is therefore only 48 cents per ton actual weight. By paying 48 cents, therefore, the steamgoing through the canal. That company successfully competes with the transcontinental railways for the sugar business and boasts that they have diverted from the all-rail route nearly a million tons annually. Will they not be still better able to compete when they can use the canal at a net saving of at least $2.50 per ton? Sugar is one of the lowest freight rates. It is carried for 35 cents per hundred from San Francisco to New York. At the time Mr. Dearborn, the president of the American-Hawaiian Co., testified there were two projects pending—one for a subsidized line, proposed by Mr. Baker, of Baltimore, to run from New York to San Francisco and to receive a subsidy under the ocean mail act of 1891—which, of course, is only applicable to foreign-going vessels—and the other a Government-owned line to operate on the same route. He naturally was opposed to both of these projects, as his company had built up its large fleet without a subsidy; simply protected by the coastwise laws against foreign competition. Here is an extract from his testimony (Panama Canal Hearings, vol. 1, p. 575):

Mr. STEVENS. The Baker ships do not have freight capacity enough to make it a business proposition?

Mr. DEARBORN. No; their time was only about a day and a half shorter than the time we expect to make. They were sharp ships. I never heard before of a subsidy applying to the American ships in the coastwise trade. It is a double subsidy. If there is anything to make the navigation laws a stench in the nostrils, it would be that.

This is the testimony of the president of the company which expects to use the canal more than any other one concern. They are perfectly willing to pay tolls, for even then they will save more than $2 on every ton carried. These advocates of free tolls continually and loudly deny that it is a subsidy, but this man who ought to know says it is a double subsidy, and he is right. To prohibit and thereby totally exclude foreign ships from domestic trade is a subsidy, for behind this wall the coastwise trade has formed combinations by which they charge what the traffic will bear in every instance, and free tolls would be the second subsidy. It would be like prohibiting the importation of an article of merchandise and then granting a bounty in addition. Take, for example, salt. We only use about 30,000,000 barrels per year, and we produce substantially that much. It now sells for 95 cents per barrel wholesale. Suppose we pass a law prohibiting the importation of salt, and then behind this wall the manufacturers combined and doubled the price to $1.90, and then came to Congress and asked for a bounty to encourage salt production of 50 cents per barrel. That would be exactly a parallel case to the free-tolls proposition. Why, I have here before me the report of the Merchant Marine Committee on the investigation of shipping combinations, which has just been printed, and in that report I read:

Combining the two interests, it appears that the railroads and two Atlantic-coast shipping consolidations control nearly 85 per cent of the steamers and nearly 94 per cent of the gross tonnage engaged in the entire Atlantic and Gulf coastwise trade. On the Great Lakes the through-package freight from the western gateways to eastern seaports via Buffalo is controlled exclusively by 6 railroad-owned boat lines, and these 6 lines represent 63 steamers of 180,007 gross tons, or approximately 47 per cent of the line steamers and 64 per cent of the line tonnage operating on the Great Lakes. Of the bulk carriers, 453 vessels of the 105 companies and firms, over three-fourths (75 per cent) are controlled by combinations.

The combination between the railroads and the coastwise vessels on the Great Lakes has actually nullified the benefit the people were to derive from the Soo Canal and Harbor improvements. It costs just as much to ship grain by water from Chicago or Duluth to the seaboard as by rail. The grain that goes by water to Buffalo is charged 14 cents per 100 to the seaboard, but only 7½ cents when it comes all rail.

Railroads manipulate rates so as to make the differential between their all-water, all-rail, and rail-water routes ineffectual, as far as water transportation is concerned. The only inducement to use the water route is economy, and if the differential between the rail and water rates is made such as to just counterbalance the disadvantages of the water route the railroads will secure the business because, all things considered, their service is preferred (p. 411, Merchant Marine Committee hearings).

On the Pacific coast, the report says:

Even the Pacific coast, including the intercoastal trade, where independent steamship lines make a more prominent showing, railroad and shipping consolidations represent a large proportion of the total tonnage. The 15 lines already noted as operating in this trade represent, after excluding the steamers engaged in the foreign trade, a total of 106 steamers of 350,512 gross tons. Three of these lines are owned by railroads and four by shipping consolidations and represent a total of 68 steamers of 172,679 gross tons, or over 64 per cent of the total tonnage.

Here we have a picture of the poor struggling industry that is to be gorged with a double subsidy. The Atlantic and Gulf coast, 94 per cent monopolized; the Great Lakes, 64 per cent of ship company will save $3, or $2.52 per net ton, on sugar by package freight and 74 per cent of bulk carriers; the Pacific coast, 64 per cent of the steamers monopolized and railroad controlled. But it is said that the repeal of free tolls is in the interest of the railroads. It costs at the very lowest calculation $6 for operating expenses to carry a ton of freight across the continent. The average charge is 7.5 mills per ton-mile. No one ever could figure the actual cost of moving freight by rail at less than 2 mills per ton-mile, which for 3,200 miles is 6,400 mills, or $6.40 per ton. If railroads undertake to haul for that or less, they will lose on every load. By water via Magellan coal is carried for one-half of that rate, and by way of the canal that kind of freight can be carried for $2.50 per ton. As will be seen by the letter from the Navy Department, even a Government collier going empty one way could carry coal through the canal at $3.90 per ton:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 19, 1914.

Hon. HALVOR STEENERSON, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. STEENERSON: Agreeable to the request contained in your letter of March 13, 1914, I am pleased to advise you of the following, relative to the transportation rates on coal for the Navy from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast (fiscal years 1912 and 1913):

Prices, 1912 (foreign): $4.78, $4.84, $4.93, $4.98, $4.98, $4.99, $5.23, $5.37, $5.44, $5.49, $5.93, $6.93.

Prices, 1912 (American): $7.50, $8.

Prices, 1913 (foreign): $3.50, $4.40, $4.74, $4.88, $4.90, $5.09, $5.34, $5.44, $6.15.

Prices, 1913 (American): $5.50, $6.50, $7, $7.32.

No coal has been shipped by rail for the Navy Department from the eastern coast States to the Pacific coast, but it is understood that the cost of such transportation would be approximately $11 per ton. No shipments of coal have been made by naval colliers from the Atlantic to the Pacific, as the cost of such transportation for such a long haul with no return cargo would be greatly in excess of the commercial rates obtainable.

With the opening of the canal it is estimated that naval colliers of the largest type—that is, 10,500 tons cargo capacity—would be able to transport coal from the Atlantic range to San Francisco at a cost of about $3.90 per ton. This cost includes the return of the collier to loading port and also includes interest, depreciation, and insurance on the cost of an $850,000 collier. Without considering interest, depreciation, and insurance, which has been reckoned at 9 per cent of the cost of a $850,000 collier, $2.57 per ton would be the flat rate, the vessel returning empty to its loading port on the Atlantic coast. Smaller colliers, of about 7,000 tons cargo capacity, would be at a somewhat increased cost, or at about $2.87 per ton for transportation; with interest, depreciation, and insurance considered on such a vessel the cost would be approximately $4.10 per ton, the vessel in each case returning to its loading port on the Atlantic coast.

The above rates on transportation of coal by naval collier through the canal do not include any canal tolls.

Sincerely, yours, JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

The Government has every year for the past few years transported coal in foreign bottoms, although the law required them to carry it in American bottoms if a reasonable bid could be obtained. But our coastwise ships were all in combination and exploiting the public, so they could not afford to carry heavy coal for the Navy. As will be seen by Exhibit C, only 12 per cent of the coal carried in the last seven years was in American ships. Eighty-eight per cent of the bids were found unreasonably high.

As we have seen, the act of 1904, relating to the transportation of coal and supplies for the use of the Army and Navy, required a finding on the part of the President that the rates of freight charged by American vessels were excessively high and unreasonable before a contract could be made with foreign bottoms. Under this law President Roosevelt made a general ruling that 50 per cent above the price offered by foreign vessels was the limit, and above this differential the rate would be deemed excessive and unreasonable. Under this ruling more than 90 per cent of all the coal used on the Pacific coast when the fleet went around the world was carried in foreign bottoms. President Taft followed the practice of the former administration and continued to award contracts to foreign bottoms where the domestic vessels' charges were in excess of 50 per cent. President Wilson, in October, last year, also made a finding, but, being a low-tariff man, he held that even if the bid of the American vessels was within 50 per cent of the excess over the foreign bid, it might be awarded to the foreign ship. I will insert the documents from the Navy Department showing these rulings. It will thus be seen that, so far as the transportation of Army and Navy supplies are concerned, the domestic ships have not got an absolute monopoly, but are protected by a differential of 50 per cent ad valorem. This is to protect the shipbuilding industry and the capital and labor employed in domestic navigation from foreign competition. So far as the public is concerned, the domestic ships can exploit us without limit. If we permitted foreign bottoms in this trade upon their payment into the United States Treasury of 33⅓ per cent of their gross earnings in the domestic traffic, the public would be protected against extortion and unreasonable rates to the same extent as the Government now is on the transportation of its military supplies by water.

This is the monopoly that my friend from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is so anxious to protect and encourage by, as he calls it, indirect subsidies or bonuses. The gentleman from Alabama has become a very high protectionist, indeed, when it comes to domestic merchant ships—he who stripped the farmers of the Northwest and exposed them to the competition of the world; he who left the thousands of poultry men, who are men of small business, and who can never combine, without protection against the merciless competition of the Chinese and other Asiatic labor. He has become the most extravagant protectionist ever known in our history. He wants to grant subsidies and bonuses to labor and capital employed in the domestic shipbuilding and shipping trade, which is already protected by an absolute exclusion and prohibition of competition, and who take advantage of every position to combine and exploit the public to the very limit of what the traffic will bear. He used to criticize the high rates of the Payne-Aldrich bill, and some of them were undoubtedly too high; but here is a wall higher than the mountains, higher than the heavens itself, and yet he is not satisfied. He wants to feed them with bonuses taken from the taxpayers in addition. Why, to compare with him the highest protectionist in the Republican Party is as a pygmy to a giant, as a Lilliputian to a Brobdingnagian. Some people are unreasonable, and the gentleman is one of them. He wants protection and subsidies at the same time. He out-Herods Herod in the protection line. He outpats a standpatter.

It may be that after free-listing pig iron, steel rails, and other crude iron and steel products, he now finds that, owing to cheaper rates of foreign ships, these commodities can be transported from Europe and laid down in the Pacific coast States for less than it costs from Birmingham, Ala., and that, to correct that tariff blunder and save his constituents from ruinous foreign competition he has been forced into this free-tolls absurdity; but it will not help him. The remedy will be to put his constituents back on the dutiable list and give them protection equal to the difference in cost of production, including transportation, at home and abroad.

The railroads will never fight the canal by competing in rates directly, but by getting control of water lines and raising rates from interior points to the seaboard. The free-tolls advocates and their newspaper organs are continually urging that repeal is in the interest of "the transcontinental railroad monopoly." It is funny to read some of these papers. All of them have contained articles and editorials urging that the 5 per cent rate increase asked for by the railroads of the Interstate Commerce Commission be granted. They appeal so tenderly that they could draw tears from a stone when they speak of the hard times the railroads have to meet increasing pay rolls and higher expenses. One would think that they would all go bankrupt unless the increase is granted immediately. Then on the next page perhaps is an editorial on free tolls, condemning in scorching language the grinding railroad monopoly grown fat on swollen transcontinental rates, which is fighting toll repeal. If one should follow the advice of these writers he would go stark mad.

But if you want real competition by way of the canal there is one way to get it. That is by removing to a limited extent the trade between Atlantic and Pacific ports in the United States from the coastwise laws. Then you would get shipping not controlled by railroad influence. They now carry coal around the Horn as low as $3 per ton. You could impose double or treble toll and still carry for less than half the actual cost of land carrying, the lowest railroad rate being $11 per ton. Double tolls or a gross earnings tax of 33 per cent would be a protective tariff to coastwise vessels equivalent to $2 per mile, the mail subsidy now paid boats of the second class in the foreign trade under the act of 1891. No foreign nation would object to this discrimination, for it would be voluntary on the boat that entered the trade from which otherwise it would be excluded. I offered a bill of that kind, but you ought to have seen the way the monopoly press of the seacoast cities and the shipping journals jumped on me. They did not seem to want competition from that quarter. It was not railroad-owned competition. It was real.

Some three years ago the President appointed Prof. E. R. Johnson, of the University of Pennsylvania, a specialist in transportation matters, special commissioner on Panama Canal traffic and tolls, and he made a most elaborate study of the subject, which is embodied in a report published by the Isthmian Canal Commission. He also appeared before the committee when they had the Panama Canal bill under consideration. His conclusions were that the same rate of tolls should be charged upon American as upon foreign vessels, because—

(a) The omission or repayment of tolls on American shipping would be of assistance mainly to our coastwise shipping, which does not need aid, and would be of but little help to American vessels engaged in the foreign trade.

(b) Such subsidies as are given the American merchant marine should be paid to vessels employed in our foreign trade; but the remission or repayment to vessel owners of Panama tolls on American ships in the foreign trade would be an ineffective subsidy that might invite retaliatory measures by foreign governments.

(c) The exemption of coastwise shipping from Panama tolls would inure mainly to the benefit of the coastwise carriers and only partially to the benefit of shippers and consumers. Neither the rates of the steamship lines nor the charges of the rail carriers will be appreciably higher if tolls are charged on coastwise shipping than they will be if such shipping is relieved from the payment of tolls.

According to Prof. Johnson's opinion, remission or nonpayment of tolls on coastwise shipping would not affect railroad rates.

Secretary Knox, in his answer to the British note, admitted that the exemption of coastwise ships from tolls would be a subsidy, and in arguing the point the Secretary said:

The exemption of the coastwise trade from tolls, or the refunding of tolls collected from the coastwise trade, is merely a subsidy granted by the United States to that trade, and the loss resulting from not collecting or from refunding those tolls will fall solely upon the United States.

It should not be overlooked that toll exemption means higher taxes for the people, for the special benefit of those interested in shipping, most of whom are, as we have seen, in combinations with themselves and with the railroads to exploit the public to the very limit. The cost of operating and defending the canal, and the interest on the investment must be borne, and if the canal fails to be self-sustaining the burden will fall upon the people at large. Prof. Johnson, in his report, among other things, says:

The Atlantic section of the United States will obtain a somewhat larger share of the trade of the Pacific coast and will secure more benefit from the cheap water route than will the Middle West. * * *
The canal will assist the Pacific Coast States in trading with the eastern and southern parts of the United States. * * *
The effects of the canal upon American trade and upon rail rates will not be much affected by the exemption of coastwise ships from the payment of Panama tolls.

He further points out that it is not probable that toll exemption would affect rates charged by regular steamship lines. It would only affect the rates of large shippers or jobbers who are able to charter vessels of their own. The traffic the common people are interested in is the traffic by the regular line steamers, and that would not be affected. On this subject he says:

Canal tolls, being a part of the cost of service, will not make line steamships' rates higher, nor will the remission of tolls cause the freight rates to be lower. This is not true of the rates payable on bulk cargoes of traffic handled in individual vessels operated under charters. Charter rates are competitive, and the few large shippers who can use a chartered vessel will be benefited by being relieved of the payment of canal tolls.

The farmers of the Pacific coast would not be likely to benefit by toll exemption, for their grain and other products are sold to the middleman. They, however, will be greatly benefited by the general lowering of rates by reason of the canal. The American-Hawaiian Steamship Co. has a rate, for instance, on barley of 35 cents a hundred pounds—$7 a ton, or 21 cents a bushel. One-third of this they pay to the Tehauntepec Railroad. By going through the canal for, say, 65 cents a ton for wheat, they could still carry for at least $2 less than they now charge, which would be at the rate of 25 cents a hundred—$5 per ton, or 15 cents per bushel. The Minnesota and North Dakota farmer who ships his wheat or his barley to New York pays 25 cents a hundred from Minneapolis or Duluth, and from 10 to 15 cents per hundred pounds to reach those markets, or about 25 cents a bushel to the seaboard. Now, why should he be taxed in order that his competitor, who gets his grain laid down in the same market for 15 cents a bushel, might get his grain there for 12 or 13 cents? Prof. Johnson points out that the rate on lumber from the Pacific coast would probably be greatly lowered. The Southern States, bordering on the Gulf and the Atlantic, now supply the Philadelphia, New York, and Boston markets with lumber; but, owing to the combinations with the railroads and coastwise ships, the rates are exorbitantly high. Lumber rates from the Southern States to New York run from $9 to $12 per thousand feet. Why should these people be further taxed in order that the Pacific coast lumbermen may have their lumber at the competing point for $6 per thousand?

In answer to the contention that equal tolls would enable the British Columbia lumber to come in and compete with the Pacific coast lumber, it might be suggested that a duty of $1.50 per thousand would be a more effectual equalizer than the remission of tolls to coastwise ships; and in that case the Treasury would get not only the duty but the canal tolls also, and nobody would be injured. Free lumber has not reduced the retail price of that commodity; and, in view of the claims that the Canadian lumber will have cheaper transportation rates through the canal than its competitors from the coast States, it would be perfectly proper to restore such a duty, especially in view of the fact that we will greatly be in need of the revenue. The people in the Pacific Coast States have mistaken their remedy. They are trying to make up for a loss of tariff by free tolls.

A great deal has been said in this controversy about the platforms of the respective parties. The Democratic platform expressly favored toll exemption, and so did the Progressive platform, but the Republican platform is silent. In view of the fact that Senator ROOT presided over the Republican convention, it may be assumed that the majority of that body was opposed to it. I contend, however, that, in view of the statement of the President recently, we could hardly excuse ourselves for maintaining the country's honor by any plank in a party platform. To err is human. Conventions err. Courts err. This is the reason why we have so many appellate courts which have no other purpose than to correct the mistakes of other courts. This is the reason why old laws are repealed at every session of Congress and every legislature. After the Democratic Party adopted that plank in their platform they promptly enacted the law promised. They have now found that it was a mistake, and they want to repeal it. There is nothing wrong that I can see about that. The leader of the Democratic Party in this House, Mr. UNDERWOOD, recently stated on the floor that in case it should be found that the Underwood tariff law was defective and did not produce sufficient revenue, or that it operated unjustly upon some industries, he would introduce a bill to change the rates and correct the mistake. That is the proper spirit to display. The laws that we make are not like the laws of the Medes and the Persians—never to be changed. I admire the frankness of the Democrats, but I have been disappointed by the Democratic Party upon the question of ship subsidies. As I have already stated, we fought out that subject for years, both in the Roosevelt administration and in the Taft administration.

As a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads I took quite a prominent part in opposing the increase of ocean mail subsidies. I was joined by the Democrats in sufficient numbers to make, with the minority of the Republicans, a majority, and ship subsidies were repeatedly defeated. I used to listen with interest to the speeches of the Democratic leaders denouncing subsidies. You can judge of my surprise when the first time that the Democratic Party got control of the House, in the Sixty-second Congress, they embodied this ship subsidy, this free-tolls provision in the Panama Canal act; only they made the mistake of giving the subsidy to the wrong ships. Instead of giving it to the American ships in the foreign trade, who had and have competition, they gave it to those in the domestic trade, which had and have no foreign competition, for the alleged reason only that they had a right to do such a foolish and unjust thing under the treaty. Yes; under the treaty you have also a right to commit suicide, and it would be just about as sensible to do so as to grant the subsidy that they did.

I am very glad that the Democratic Party, through the good sense of its present leader, President Wilson, has come to its senses and has seen the error of its way, and come over to my point of view on this subject. I only want to say to those Democrats who rebel against that leadership that now is the time for you to show your loyalty. It will not be long before you will all go before the people for reelection on the plea that you will stand by and uphold the President. How can the people depend upon you to uphold the President and the country's honor in the future if you refuse to do it now?

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF SUPPLIES AND ACCOUNTS,
Washington, D. C., March 27, 1914.

Hon. HALVOR STEENERSON, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. STEENERSON: Agreeable to your verbal request of this date, the bureau incloses for your information copies of the department's letters of October 24 and 29, 1907, in reference to differential rates on foreign and domestic vessels employed in transporting coal to the Pacific coast on account of the Navy Department.

Sincerely, yours,

T. J. COWIE,
Paymaster General, United States Navy.

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
BUREAU OF EQUIPMENT,
Washington, D. C., October 24, 1907.

SIR: 1. The bureau forwards herewith for the information of the department:

(a) Letter from the Boston Towboat Co., dated October 1, 1907, with reference to the use of their ships for transporting coal to the Pacific coast for naval uses.

(b) Copy of the reply of the Bureau of Equipment. Attention is invited to the latter part of paragraph 2.

(c) Letter from the Boston Towboat Co., dated October 14, 1907, to the effect that a cargo had been arranged for one of their ships which would now be brought from the Pacific coast for the purpose of transporting a cargo of coal for the Navy to that coast, and that the rate of transportation expected is on the basis of an advance of 50 per cent over the rate paid to foreign vessels.

(d) Copy of the reply of the Bureau of Equipment, attention being invited to paragraph 2.

(e) Letter of the Boston Towboat Co., dated October 21, 1907, to the effect that they were arranging to bring a second ship to the east coast for the purpose of transporting coal for the Navy. This communication has been acknowledged.

2. As stated in the correspondence attached, the bureau is not advised as to the intention to continue the policy looking to paying American steamers a rate equal to an increase of 50 per cent over the rates paid to foreign vessels, and instructions are requested.

3. In this connection it is proper to state that the bureau's understanding of the President's offer to pay American vessels this increase of 50 per cent was due to the expressed inability of American ships to obtain return cargoes to the Atlantic coast after having discharged their coal cargoes, and was not intended to be a continuous policy.

4. In the opinion of the bureau the offer should not apply to these vessels, for the reason that their home port is on the Pacific coast; they admittedly have cargoes to bring them to the Atlantic coast, and unless another cargo from the Pacific coast be found them they may not be expected to return to the Atlantic coast for another coal cargo.

5. Attention is invited to the fact that at the opening of proposals on September 24 for transportation of coal for the fleet, the steamer Virginian was offered by the American-Hawaiian Steamship Co. at $8 per ton and was accepted, the company being able to make this rate for the reason that the ship is bringing cargo to the Atlantic coast and must return to the Pacific, a situation analogous to that existing with regard to the ships of the Boston Towboat Co. Any action looking to paying to other American ships a rate in excess of the rate paid to this ship under similar conditions will cause dissatisfaction on the part of the owners of the Virginian and result in the vessels of this company and other American vessels being offered in the future on the same basis that these ships may be chartered for regardless of conditions.

6. The bureau has been in negotiations with this company for one of their ships, the Missourian, about 9,500 tons capacity, at the same rate of freight to be paid for the Virginian; i. e., at $8 per ton, and the bureau is led to believe that the company is holding off in order to ascertain what may be done with regard to other ships.

Very respectfully,

A. C. WRENN,
Acting Chief of Bureau of Equipment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,

MEMORANDUM FOR CHIEF OF BUREAU OF EQUIPMENT.

Referring to the bureau's letter of October 24 and the papers attached thereto:

The matter referred to therein was taken up at an interview with the President on the 26th instant, and he verbally confirmed the statements made in paragraph 2 of the bureau's letter of October 19, addressed to the Boston Towboat Co. The bureau will be guided accordingly.

The papers inclosed are returned herewith.

TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY,
Assistant Secretary.

One inclosure.

NOVEMBER 1, 1913.

MEMORANDUM IN CONNECTION WITH TRANSPORTATION OF COAL.

Under the terms of the act approved April 28, 1904 (33 Stat. L., 518), it appears that coal for the use of the Navy must be transported in American vessels unless the President shall find that the rates of freight charged by such vessels are excessive and unreasonable, or no vessels of American registry, or an insufficient quantity of such vessels are offered. (26 A. G. O., 415.)

Under decisions by former Presidents Roosevelt and Taft an advance of 50 per cent over and above the rate charged for transportation in a foreign bottom has generally been considered as excessive, and where the prices offered have exceeded those figures the transportation has been assigned to foreign vessels. However, each case has been given consideration on its own merits and conditions in the foreign shipping market, which justified extremely low prices at certain times, do not usually affect the American shipping market, so that correspondingly lower prices can be offered for vessels of American registry.

Where the market for foreign vessels is abnormally low, consideration must be given to the question of whether or not the prices for American vessels are correspondingly abnormally high or are about the normal rates. In the case under consideration the lowest price offered for a foreign vessel for the transportation of coal to Puget Sound from the Atlantic coast—$4.74 per ton—is unusually low, in view of the present condition of the foreign shipping market, as evidenced by the other prices offered for foreign vessels, which vary from $5.23 to $8.83 per ton, while the price at which the only American steamer is offered—$7 per ton—is not considered unreasonable, as it is not 50 per cent in advance of the lowest price offered for a foreign vessel, and is the same as the price at which an American sailing vessel is offered, whereas it is usually considered that a sailing vessel should be secured at a price at least 50 cents per ton cheaper than an American steamer.

There have been a number of cases in which the bids offered for American vessels were more than 50 per cent in excess of that at which foreign tonnage could be secured, and upon taking the matter up with the owners of the American vessels their prices have been reduced to or below the 50 per cent limit, and the vessels then chartered by the department. It has therefore been the general policy to accept bids not more than 50 per cent in excess of the rate offered for foreign tonnage unless other conditions indicated that the rates offered within this limit were abnormal and unreasonable.

The bureau is of the opinion that $7 per ton for an American steamer for the transportation of coal to Puget Sound at this time is a reasonable rate, and recommends that it be accepted.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, November 1, 1913.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The department wishes to send a cargo of coal from Hampton Roads to Puget Sound. Under the terms of the act of April 28, 1904 (33 Stat. L., 518), coal for the use of the Navy must be transported in American vessels unless the President shall find that the rates of freight charged by such vessels are excessive and unreasonable, or no vessels of American registry, or an insufficient quantity of such vessels are offered.

Under decisions by former Presidents Roosevelt and Taft an advance of 50 per cent or more over and above the rate charged for transportation in a foreign bottom was considered excessive. When the prices offered by American bottoms exceeded these figures the transportation was assigned to foreign vessels.

The department has received offers for the transportation of one shipload as follows:

Lowest bid for a foreign vessel, $4.74 per ton.

Lowest bid for American vessel, $7 per ton.

While the difference in this case does not amount to quite 50 per cent, I believe that the difference in the price offered is, within the meaning of the act, excessive on the part of the American offer. I therefore request that you approve the award of the contract for carrying this shipment of coal to the lowest bidder, to be carried in a foreign vessel, at $4.74 per ton.

Faithfully, yours,

(Signed) JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

Approved.

WOODROW WILSON.

EXHIBIT D.

PANAMA RAILROAD CO.,
24 State Street, New York, March 16, 1914.

Hon. HALVOR STEENERSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 13th instant, addressed to the Washington office of the Isthmian Canal Commission, has been referred to us.

We inclose, as requested, a copy of our tariff covering rates from New York and interior points to ports on the Pacific coast of the United States. The lowest rate indicated in this tariff is 45 cents per 100 pounds, which applies to a number of commodities. Our revenue for carrying this freight from New York to Colon by our steamship line and from Colon to Balboa by our railroad, including free wharfage and cranage charges to the steamer of the Pacific carrier at Balboa, is 40 per cent of the through rate, or 18 cents per hundred.

The rate on lumber from Pacific coast ports in the United States to New York via our route is 40 cents per 100 pounds, figured on the basis of 1,000 feet of lumber being equivalent to 3,300 pounds.

Yours, respectfully,

T. H. ROSSBOTTOM, Secretary.

EXHIBIT E.

AMERICAN-HAWAIIAN STEAMSHIP CO.,
MARITIME BUILDING, 8 BRIDGE STREET,
New York, March 18, 1914.

Hon. HALVOR STEENERSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have for acknowledgment your letter 13th March asking, first, for a folder containing a description of our vessels plying between New York and Tehuantepec and San Francisco and the Hawaiian Islands, and also making inquiries with reference to passenger rates.

We carry no passengers, and the ships in our service are devoted entirely to the freighting business.

We have no folder such as you request, and are mailing you to-day a calendar which will show the route at present, and also the prospective route via the Panama Canal. You will observe that the Panama Canal route is some 1,200 miles longer.

We have 18 steamers employed in the Tehuantepec route at the present time, and in anticipation of the Panama Canal have had built eight additional freight steamers of the highest type.

The rate for raw sugar from Honolulu to New York or Philadelphia is, in full cargo lots, 47½ cents per 100 pounds.

We have a rate on refined sugar from San Francisco to New York of 50 cents in carload lots, but there is no movement from San Francisco to New York.

To give you an idea of our rates we mention the following from the Pacific coast ports to New York and sometimes to other Atlantic ports:

	Per 100 pounds.
Canned goods	$0.45
Barley	.35
Asphalt	.30
Canned salmon	.40
Shingles	.55
Lumber	.50 to .55
Canned fruits	.45

The rate on canned pineapples from the Hawaiian Islands is 65 cents per 100 pounds.

You may have a good understanding of the shipping business and the elements which enter into freight rates, but if so, it is unusual for one not in the business.

We have never applied for or advocated an exemption from tolls, but it is undoubtedly a fact that the effect of the application of tolls will be to restrict the area of the country which the various Panama Canal services will serve.

Respectfully, yours, E. D. DOUGLAS, Treasurer.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, there is no question before Congress that has caused so much interesting and able debate and unfortunately such bitter debate as the question of repealing the law exempting coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls for the use of the Panama Canal. I propose to discuss this question without accusing any man of cowardice or being the tool of any special interest. I assume that every man here is governed by patriotic motives. We have built the Panama Canal at an expense of $400,000,000, and it is our duty to use it for the benefit of the people who paid for it. We all agree to this extent. The question can be discussed and ought to be discussed without personalities. Our real difference is a matter of difference of opinion as to the facts.

This bill raises two distinct questions: (1) Is it for the benefit of the American people that the coastwise shipping should be exempted from the payment of tolls as a purely domestic policy? (2) Is it for the benefit of the American people, in their relations to the rest of the world, to exempt the coastwise ships?

Even the men who are in favor of the exemption must admit that it is an indirect subsidy or special benefit to the coastwise shipping at the expense of the American people. It will cost $4,000,000 a year to maintain and operate the canal, and it will require $12,000,000 more to pay interest on the canal bonds. This money must be raised either by taxation or by the levying of tolls upon the ships which use the canal. If the coastwise shipping is relieved from paying its share of the cost of maintaining and operating the canal, American taxpayers must make it up. This exemption means at least a million dollars in the first year and will increase to several million dollars per year eventually. In effect, that amount will be taken from the pockets of the taxpayers and paid into the treasury of the corporations owning the ships engaged in the coastwise trade.

This indirect subsidy is justified by those who favor it on the ground that the public will be benefited by the reduction in the cost of transportation, not only in the shipping rates but also in the rates charged by the transcontinental railways. They propose to lower railroad rates through a subsidy given to the shipping monopoly.

A careful study of the relation of railroad rates to water rates shows conclusively that this claim is unfounded. To-day there is some competition between the railroads and the shipping interests for transcontinental freight. Freight carried by the ships is either around the Horn or by way of the Isthmus of Panama. The distance around the Horn from coast to coast is some 13,000 miles. The Panama Canal will reduce that to 5,000. Freight by the way of the Isthmus has to be unloaded, shipped across the Isthmus by rail, and then reloaded. The Panama Canal will shorten the time by 10 days. The cost of unloading the freight from the ships and transporting it by rail and reloading is about $4 per ton. The proposed tolls are about 50 cents per ton. The Panama Canal will save not only 10 days' time, but $3.50 per ton on all shipments. It will be impossible for the railroads to reduce their rates anywhere near to the cost of water transportation. What will happen is this: The shipping interests will have a monopoly on a large part of the freight that moves from one coast to another, and they will charge what the traffic will bear. They will put their rates as near the railroad rates as they can get them and not throw the business to the railroads. There is no certainty nor even probability that the people of the country will get back in lower railroad rates what they pay to the ship interests by this subsidy.

No one can claim that the coastwise shipping business needs Government aid. It is no infant industry. We have one of the largest fleets of coastwise ships in the world. From 1900 to 1910 the coastwise shipping of the United States increased 48 per cent. When the Panama Canal is opened there will be, undoubtedly, a much larger increase.

I wish to suggest to my Progressive friends that it is futile to attempt to control one monopoly by giving especial privilege to another monopoly. If the American people can not get through the Interstate Commerce Commission reasonable railroad rates, there is only one alternative, and that is Government ownership. The shipping interest is to-day a monopoly. There is no active competition in the rates. This has been proved beyond question by the investigation and report of the Committee on Merchant Marine of the present Congress. To-day the ships engaged in coastwise trade are owned either by railroads or holding companies, or their rates are fixed by conference and agreement.

I will now turn to the other aspect of the case—the one that is perhaps more important and certainly more in the public mind than the one of domestic policy. Is it for the welfare of the people of the United States in its relations with the rest of the world to charge tolls on all ships engaged in foreign commerce and to exempt the ships engaged in coastwise traffic? I do not propose to go into any elaborate discussion of the treaty with England. I have not the time even if I so desired. That is a complicated matter. I propose to discuss the international question raised by this bill on broader ground than any one treaty. If there were no treaty with any nation, I believe it would be not only fair and honorable, but for the commercial welfare of this country to treat the canal as an international highway for the trade of the world and to give equal rights to all ships of commerce and special privileges to none. I disagree with the men here who state that this canal was built primarily for the purpose of developing our merchant marine, and I do not believe the people so regard it. The canal was built for two purposes, which should be kept distinct. It was built first for military purposes—for the protection and defense of the American Nation. The repeal bill now under discussion in no way affects our war right over the canal. We have fortified it. Our own Government ships can go and come as they please, and in time of war we shall use the canal in any way that we see fit for our national defense.

But we also built the canal for its commercial possibilities. Ever since the new world was discovered it has been one of the ambitions of mankind to connect the Atlantic and the Pacific by a canal across the Isthmus of Panama. We have achieved that ambition. We should consider it impressed with an international interest and hold it open to commerce of the world on equal terms. If the time ever comes when the American people desire to build up their merchant marine by Government aid, they should do it and will do it by a direct money subsidy and not by the discriminatory use of this great international highway. The Suez Canal is open on the same terms to the ships of all nations. The Canadian canals which connect the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River are open to our ships on equal terms. For a hundred years we have stood for the policy that the sea, the arms of the sea, the straits of the sea, and the great canals that connect the oceans of the world should be open to all ships on equal terms. We have demanded this of other nations. We should now grant it to other nations. In this way, and in this way alone, lies peace—not peace at any price, but peace with honor—the only peace that can be permanent or beneficial, founded on an exercise of our rights and power with a due regard for the rights of other nations. [Applause.]

Let me warn my friends here who are interested in building up the commerce of the United States that commerce and the commercial prosperity of a nation, like the prosperity of an individual, rests upon a due regard for the rights of others. We have the undoubted power to use this canal in any way that we see fit, but it is our duty not only to other nations, but to ourselves and our own interests to treat all ships alike. [Applause.]

I shall vote for the repeal of the exemption of coastwise ships from the payment of tolls not because the President asks it, not because England wants it, but because I am convinced that it is for the benefit of the American people, both as a domestic and international policy. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, when this subject of canal tolls was before us in the last Congress I debated it on two occasions and, more fortunate than some, I find that there is nothing I then said which I wish to retract or alter now. [Applause.] I opposed free tolls then on the ground that it was probably a breach of the treaty, and that it was economically preposterous to subsidize in this manner our coastwise fleet, which was a flourishing monopoly, and except from the subsidy our vessels engaged in foreign trade, which were in dire need of some such assistance to preserve them from complete extinction. I also argued that no matter what the consequences we ought to submit the interpretation of this treaty to a judicial tribunal, for otherwise we should justly forfeit our position as leaders in the cause of arbitration. Those opinions I still hold, and perhaps I should not think it necessary to reaffirm them now if there had not occurred during the interval such remarkable conversions as to shock public confidence in the binding force of convictions, and if the President's brief message did not omit all reference to certain historic incidents which I think deserve to be recalled.

The committee which prepared the Democratic platform at Baltimore, on which President Wilson stood and was elected, was dominated by Mr. Bryan. That platform said:

> We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

That exemption was passed by a Democratic House of Representatives, and in the Republican Senate only one Democratic Senator voted against it.

The Secretary of State, who framed that platform and in behalf of whose department this legislation is now requested, declared:

> A man who violates the party platform is a criminal, worse than the man who embezzles money.

President Wilson, who now asks his party to break the pledge of their platform, when he was seeking votes on the canal-tolls issue, addressed a gathering of farmers on August 15, 1912, and pointed with approval to this legislation, saying:

> One of the bills pending, passed, I believe, yesterday by the Senate, as it has passed the House, provides for free tolls for American ships through that canal. * * * The farmers of this country are, in my judgment, just as much concerned in the policy of the United States with regard to that canal as any other class of citizens of the United States. * * * Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means business. It means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest and honest men who intend to do business along those lines and who are not waiting to see whether they can catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not.
> They know the American people are now taking notice in a way in which they never took notice before, and gentlemen who talk one way and vote another are going to be retired to a very quiet and private retreat.

President Wilson on December 8, 1913, to a delegation of women who asked him to urge upon Congress woman suffrage, said:

> I set myself this very strict rule when I was governor of New Jersey, and have followed it as President, that I am not at liberty to urge upon Congress, in messages, policies which have not had the organic consideration of those for whom I am spokesman. * * * I have to confine myself to those things which have been embodied as promises to the people at an election. That is the strict rule I set for myself.

And now this very President who angled for the farmers' vote by showing them how free tolls would help them, who in the same speech reproached gentlemen "who talk one way and vote another," who said the platform "is not molasses to catch flies," who refused the request of the suffragists on the ground that he should only address Congress on subjects which his party platform had indorsed, this President exposes himself to his own reproaches, violates what he asserted was his own strict rule of conduct, deserts the voters for whom the molasses was spread, and avows that this exemption from tolls, affirmed in the Democratic platform and indorsed by him personally in the campaign—> constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view, and is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain.

And he does this without any apology, explanation, or indication that he has held any different opinion.

It is, of course, flattering to us who always opposed free tolls to have the President abandon the Democratic platform and his own position when a candidate and come over to us. New converts are apt to excite more enthusiasm and evoke more applause than the steadfast and unwavering believers; but when we read the unstinted adulation in the administration press and the appeals to staud by the President as if he were the original inventor of this policy, I am afraid some of us appreciate the feelings of the faithful and reliable elder brother when the fatted calf was killed for the prodigal son. [Laughter and applause.]

It is not forbidden to statesmen to change their minds. History records many instances. Inconsistency does not prove hypocrisy. But I think of no instance in our history where a great party, with its chieftain at its head, has committed so sudden, so glaring, so unexplained a reversal of policy, has performed so complete and so spectacular a somersault. To find a satisfactory precedent in parliamentary history you have to go back nearly a century to the repeal of the corn laws by Sir Robert Peel, and the illustration used by Disraeli then is interesting now. He said:

> The conversion of the Saxons by Charlemagne is the only historical incident that bears any parallel to this illustrious occasion. The old chronicler informs us that they were converted in battalions and baptized in platoons.
> [Laughter.]

If the President had admitted his change of heart and frankly avowed that he was wrong before, it would have gone far to disarm opposition and soften criticism. [Applause.] But, on the contrary, he ignores entirely the past and appeals, with his invariable felicity of phrase and charm of style, to motives of principle and honor, as if no one would recall that their force should have been just as great when he was deaf to them, and that they were just as momentous and imperative when he and the Democratic Party denied them. The astute brevity of his five-minute message spared his explaining unpleasant and discordant facts. But when an important and sudden change of mind is made by a great party leader, I think a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that he should defend, explain, or at least allude to the change. To ignore it invites attack and exasperates opposition.

But there is an inconsistency in the message itself, short as it is. He asks us first to repeal the act on grounds of duty and generosity. It was a noble appeal to the higher impulses of the American people. But, as if afraid to trust to that appeal, he afterwards adds:

> I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not give it to me.

Abandoning the ground of magnanimity, he now asks it to save his foreign policy. It is, I think, unfortunate that he did not dare to risk success upon the loftier ground. [Applause.] Those of us who stood there before, when there was no pressure of foreign complications, would not have deserted, and I trust the administration influence, which at other times has been so potent with this Congress, would not have failed here. But perhaps he knew best the Democratic majority to which he was appealing. To me it seems humiliating to do now as an act of necessity and self-preservation what we should have done cheerfully and gladly as an act of justice and wisdom. How can we claim that we are generous when we are yielding to the plea of self-interest? What magnanimity is there in an act without which we should be helpless in our foreign policy? When you admit that you are driven by stress of circumstances, a simultaneous claim that you are actuated by love of abstract justice will receive slight credence. And I think that under the language of the President's message the nations of the world, who probably know what is meant by the "matters of greater delicacy" which have not been revealed to us, will give us little credit for magnanimity and will attribute all to the pressure of necessity. And our enemies will be prone to intimate that it was not until this pressure was felt that the administration changed its policy and appreciated the beauty of generosity and the nobility of doing the large thing, that the conversion resulted rather from the exigency of the political situation than from the calm voice of reason. A high-spirited nation does not like to change its policy under the dictation of foreign complications. I think the administration has done what it could to make it difficult for the United States to retreat with credit.

I do not cite these inconsistencies as impeaching the honor or honesty of the President. I have no doubt myself that he is sincere in his present convictions. I presume his first opinion was adopted without thorough investigation, and that when he studied he recognized his mistake. But it illustrates and exemplifies again what I have before charged as the fatal weakness of this administration in its foreign affairs, that it adopts opinions and policies because they are convenient or popular at the moment, without studying their ultimate consequences or inevitable results, and so finds itself floundering in difficulties and complications which a wise foresight and preparation would have avoided. In this case the error is admitted and abandoned, but in other cases it is maintained and persevered in, and the Nation suffers. It is better to be right at last than never to be right at all; but in foreign affairs it is peculiarly important to be right at first, to foresee consequences, and not to adopt measures which other nations can justly constrain us to renounce or which our own interests or honor recommend us to abandon. Foreign affairs are, from their nature, an executive function; they are left to the State Department, with little control from Congress, and their management by this administration has not been creditable. Responsibility goes with power, and our foreign policy ought not to fluctuate with the eccentricities of opportunism or the emergencies of domestic politics. Its straight course ought to be laid out and followed with a painstaking, undeviating determination.

I trust the passage of this bill will relieve the present emergency, that the embarrassment and constraint under which our foreign policy is suffering may be allayed, and that such care and foresight will hereafter be exercised that we shall not become involved again in entanglements from which we can only be rescued by a national retreat and a party apostasy. I would gladly have voted for the bill simply on grounds of national honor and amity or of economic wisdom. I do it with less satisfaction when it is requested as an escape from foreign dangers. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MORGAN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, this controversy has been discussed with statesmanlike sagacity; its vulnerable spots have been assailed and exposed; its strong points clearly elucidated and cleverly defended. Therefore, no matter what follows, it will, in a great measure, be a repetition of that which has already been so ably expressed.

Deeply impressed with a consciousness that I am responsible to the American people as well as my own constituency for my public acts, and, moreover, moved by a sense of duty I owe to the Nation with whose honor and protection we are intrusted, I am impelled to vote against the pending bill.

I, too, have given this matter serious thought, and after grave consideration of the point in controversy I have arrived at the irresistible conclusion that the exemption of American ships engaged in coastwise trade is in thorough harmony with the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and in nowise discriminates against Great Britain. However, I may be devoid of that enlightened wisdom which enables Sir Edward Grey to place such a self-sacrificing construction thereon.

Our great and magnanimous Nation sincerely and truly feels very kindly toward Great Britain. We are joined by ties of blood and united by bonds of friendship. But unquestionably we have our sympathetic limitations, and those limitations can by no means be transcended.

Now, it is urged, and with some seriousness, too, that when we permit an American ship, exclusively engaged in coastwise trade, to ply through the Panama Canal without the necessity of paying a toll, we openly repudiate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and sink our national honor deep into the mire of degradation. This, it has been intimated, may strain unduly our delightful diplomatic relations with Great Britain. But if it does strain those relations it will not be at the sacrifice of our national honor, but through maintaining inviolate the integrity of our national sovereignty.

Now, the exemption in question applies solely to domestic ships engaged in transporting domestic commerce from one domestic port to another. This is a prerogative which no foreign ship enjoys; they are absolutely barred from participating in that traffic. About this there is and can be no diversity of opinion. On the other hand, both American and foreign ships engaged in foreign commerce are placed upon exactly the same parity as to tolls, so whence comes the discrimination against Great Britain?

It occurs to me that this British diagnostician, Sir Edward Grey, is after all intrinsically human.

Shakespeare said:

That self-love, my liege, is not so vile a sin as self-neglecting.

Now it is evident that Sir Edward Grey is not overlooking anything, particularly anything which will benefit the merchant marine of Great Britain, even at the expense of the domestic commerce of the United States. But why this altruism on our part?

Now I quote some platform scripture: "We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal."

Change! There the epitaph of all the years were sounded! I am changed, too. Let it be. Yet it is sad to know my latest tears were faithful to a memory, not to thee.

A few brief months ago, and vividly do I remember it, several Members of the House voted in accordance with pledges made by them in good faith during the last congressional campaign—pledges that they honestly believed the Democratic platform authorized and empowered them to make, and yet they were excoriated and derided by two or three illustrious Members of the House, who vociferously declared that these erring mortals should stand by the platform of the Democratic Party without equivocation or evasion.

Romeo, Romeo, wherefore are thou Romeo?

Now it develops and comes to pass that these impeccable gentlemen, these apostles of platform inviolability, who then threw up their hands in holy horror, are now not only violating the true spirit of the platform but are actually eviscerating it.

After this digression, after this flagrant act of apostasy on the part of these hypercritical gentlemen, they should—at least in the future—refrain from admonishing other Members against violating the platform tenets. Each of the gentlemen in question must correct the infirmities of his own nature before undertaking to criticize the delinquencies of others. They should not call attention to the mote in the eyes of their brother when the beam is in their own.

This great American institution, dug and constructed by American skill and American brains, upon property bought and paid for by American dollars, contributed by American taxpayers for the use and benefit of American people, should be supervised and controlled by this Government, untrammeled and undeterred by any other nation under the blue canopy of heaven.

Opening the canal to American ships free of tolls will enable the States along the Mississippi and its tributaries and on the Pacific and Gulf coasts to freely interchange their commodities. This will essentially cheapen the necessities of life, hence a sound economic policy for the Government to adopt. Furthermore, the exemption will bring to Louisiana many and varied opportunities for industrial and commercial development.

Now, if we have been so improvident as to clothe Great Britain with the extraordinary privilege of compelling the United States to impose a tax upon its coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal, or have accorded to the ships of Great Britain the same privileges and prerogatives we have extended to our own ships engaged exclusively in domestic traffic, I unqualifiedly say: Desecrate not that puerile agreement, for I have too much respect for our national honor, too much consideration for fair dealing, to attempt to squirm out of even such a lamentable predicament, notwithstanding the fact that I am eternally and irrevocably opposed as a matter of principle to Great Britain or any other nation usurping the right to advise us how we ought to conduct our internal affairs. However, it is my judgment that if the treaty-making power did undertake to vest such authority in Great Britain, it thereby exceeded the scope of its authority. No treaty-making power can ever barter away any part or parcel of the sovereignty of the United States. It is one of the inherent attributes of the sovereignty to administer its own affairs as it deems best, and no treaty-making power can circumscribe or alienate it. That is one of the fundamental principles of international law, and any treaty stipulation in violation of that principle is necessarily void de jure.

It is generally understood that Great Britain has the ablest and most astute treaty writers in the world. Yet, according to all the eminent authorities on international law, no treaty can restrict by implication any nation's right of sovereignty or independence. Such a restriction must be couched in plain, unequivocal, and unmistakable language, otherwise it will not be given the merest effect. Now we find men of intellect throughout the United States honestly differing concerning the interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Does this not at least tend to show that Great Britain is simply endeavoring to enrich herself at the expense of the United States?

I am as anxious as any other man for the public happiness, and second to none when it comes to safeguarding our national honor, but I respectfully contend that the repeal of the exemption given to our ships would be an inglorious surrender of one of our inherent rights of sovereignty, a great and everlasting victory for the transcontinental railroads—especially the Canadian Pacific—and an act that would practically defeat the primary object for which the Panama Canal was constructed, namely, to encourage the growth of our domestic commerce.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMSON].

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote in favor of the pending bill, which repeals that part of the Panama Canal act which exempts coastwise shipping of the United States from the payment of tolls in connection with their use of the canal.

Much as I dislike to do it, I feel constrained to differ with my colleagues, although they include Mr. MURDOCK, whom I respect and admire, and Mr. TEMPLE, who made such a strong speech here this afternoon, and who, 15 years ago, was my professor in college on subjects akin to the one before us.

While I am convinced that it is my duty to support the bill, I have hesitated to take any part in this debate. I do not do so in the hope that I may shed any new light on this much controverted question, for I think anything that may be said on either side has been said before. Many of our very ablest authorities on international law have given expression to their views on this matter, and you all know that some of them are to be found on one side and some on the other. Most American authorities take the position that the point which has been raised by Great Britain to the effect that the exemption of American coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls is in contravention of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty—assuming that tolls are to be charged against British shipping—is well taken, while, on the other hand, we find some authorities in Europe, such as the London Law Journal, who take the view that there is nothing in the treaty which forbids that part of our Panama Canal act which the bill now before us seeks to repeal.

I have felt constrained to give some expression of my views in this debate, inasmuch as the Progressive Party platform contains a clause in the plank having to do with the Panama Canal, which demands free tolls for American coastwise shipping. I have given this subject earnest study and I have not been able to escape the conviction that the exemption of American coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls is in violation of the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The maintenance of our national good faith demands that we fulfill the terms of this and every other international contract in letter and in spirit. Certainly one should not hesitate to place national honor above party platform. [Applause.]

Believing, as I do, that if we are to keep faith with Great Britain in this matter we must repeal the features of the Panama Canal act which the bill now before us will repeal, I firmly believe that I not only have the right to vote as I propose to, notwithstanding the clause in the platform to which I have referred, but I would consider it a breach of the oath I took when I became a Member of this House if I did not so vote.

Of course, this grant of free tolls to American coastwise shipping is nothing more nor less than the grant of a subsidy to a special interest. Realizing that a straight out-and-out subsidy could never be put through Congress, they tucked it into this Panama Canal act, where they could cover it up with the Monroe doctrine, the grand old flag, and a number of other things that would cause people to miss the point. And now when the real nature of the thing is being shown up and it is being demonstrated that in granting this subsidy the provisions of our treaty with Great Britain have been violated, those who favor the subsidy are folding the red, white, and blue about it and calling it "patriotism." And the people who are without the opportunity of examining all the facts involved, or are not in the habit of regarding facts, are being duly impressed with the performance.

I shall not attempt to discuss the economics of this problem but shall confine my remarks to the point I have referred to and indicate the reasons which have led me to conclude that if we are to fulfill the terms of our treaty with Great Britain we can not charge tolls in the case of the ships of that nation passing through the canal and at the same time exempt our own coastwise shipping.

As has been well said by Prof. Wambaugh, of the Harvard Law School, "In these days equality is the only ideal justice," and therefore "a treaty must be understood to establish equality unless there is emphatic language to the contrary."

Any treaty between two such countries as these is necessarily written in the atmosphere of their several, and in this instance, concurrent systems of local law.

It must be recognized as a sound general principle that when a nation enters upon a business which is non-governmental in character it assumes toward its own citizens and toward the citizens of other nations duties similar to those owed by private individuals engaged in a similar business, and more especially is this true as to those kinds of business which are deemed public callings.

And what are public callings? Without attempting to fully answer that question, it is enough for the present purpose to point out that by both reason and authority the character of a public calling attaches to a canal. Indeed, a canal is a somewhat clearer instance than a railroad. Canals having preceded railroads, furnish an earlier example of a public calling. A canal more obviously than a railroad renders unlikely the building of a competitor in the same neighborhood and for the purpose of meeting the same need. It is a public highway, open to all alike.

Thus, independently of any treaty, one reaches the conclusion that by the rules of law observed in the United States and England the United States, whenever owning or controlling a public canal, is, as a matter of principle, under the duty of permitting the canal to be used by all comers at rates which are reasonable and which do not discriminate.

Most of the argument on the interpretation of this treaty centers about what is known as the all-nations clause, which is clause 1 of article 3. It reads as follows:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

Applying the general propositions to which I have referred, to these words, it would seem that in the absence of clear language to the contrary this so-called all-nations clause, with its provision of "entire equality," is to be understood as including vessels of commerce and of war of the United States among those enjoying the rights of the canal and as recognizing the rights of all vessels from other "nations observing these rules" to be treated on the same basis as those of the United States.

If the canal had been built, as the treaty permitted, not by the Government but by individuals or by a corporation, the duty of treating all vessels, whether American or foreign, on the same basis would have been enforced by the United States for and against every nation, including itself; and it seems reasonable to believe that the equal rights and duties of Americans, British, and others were not affected by the adoption of the other alternative which the treaty permitted—the building of the canal by our Government. It should be borne in mind that the later acquirement of sovereign privileges from the Republic of Panama did not affect the rights and duties of the United States as to this matter, for in article 4 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty it is agreed "that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the aforementioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty." The obligation of the United States consequently remains what it was at the time the treaty was consummated.

It can not be that when the United States, by a treaty entered into when it was not as yet entitled to sovereign powers in Panama, arranged for the possibility of entering upon a public calling, it is to be understood to have intended to reserve in that treaty, otherwise than through the use of extraordinary language, a right to carry on that business in a discriminatory manner, which its own courts in dealing with similar callings have pronounced unbusinesslike, impolitic, dishonorable, and illegal under laws passed by its own Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me to be clear that if we are to correctly understand the words and the meaning of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, we must not only carefully study the entire text of the treaty itself, but we must endeavor to comprehend the general intent, through an examination of the general principles of law, and certainly we must bear in mind the purpose of all treaties—the purpose "that there shall be peace and not war, contentment and not irritation, equality and not inequality."

We shall find it necessary if we are to come as near as we may to the real meaning of the treaty, the interpretation of which is in dispute, if we remember that the text is not in the nature of a provision of municipal law but is an international contract concluded between two powers. It follows that if either of the parties to such a contract desires to reserve to itself liberty of action with a view to limiting the operation of the treaty provisions, such liberty of action must have been expressly stipulated for under the treaty. To my mind, the terms of article 3, to which I referred some minutes ago, do not indicate that either of the contracting powers in executing this treaty reserved to itself rights or privileges which would exempt that power from the conditions established for nations at large.

But, before going into the terms of the treaty itself, may I remind you that it is a residuum? Is it not a creation of the diplomatists of two nations facing a new crisis and coming together to find a way out. It is a deliberate alteration of a previous status. To correctly understand the alteration we must examine the previous status. But if we are to correctly comprehend that previous status, we must go behind that and look at the history of the development of this canal question from its beginning.

During the quarter of a century from 1825 to 1850 there seems to have been no appreciation of the economic problem and no accurate estimate of the place the canal would take commercially. Canal projects became the playthings of enthusiasts abroad and practical politicians on this side of the water. The Central American States were always willing to grant concessions for a "consideration," and prominent individuals and commercial companies were ready to embark in a venture more or less advantageous to them as individuals or as political actors in the times in which they lived.

In 1826 Mr. Clay, then Secretary of State in the Cabinet of John Quincy Adams, said, in his instructions to Messrs. Anderson and Sergeant, United States representatives to the Panama Congress:

If a canal across the Isthmus be opened so as to admit of the passage of sea vessels from ocean to ocean, the benefit of it ought not to be exclusively appropriated to any one nation, but should be extended to all parts of the globe upon the payment of a just compensation for reasonable tolls.

In 1830 the King of the Netherlands entered into an engagement with Nicaragua for the construction of a canal "to be opened on the same terms to all nations." The United States offered no diplomatic objections to this, but directed our representative to secure a share in the stock of the company that was contemplated.

On March 3, 1835, the Senate of the United States adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to consider the expediency of opening negotiations with the governments of other nations, and particularly with the Governments of Central America and New Granada, for the purpose of effectually protecting by suitable treaty stipulations with them such individuals or companies as may undertake to open a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the construction of a ship canal across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and of securing forever by such stipulations the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all such nations on the payment of such reasonable tolls as may be established to compensate the capitalists who may engage in such undertaking and complete the work.

In 1839 the canal question was taken up in the House of Representatives on a memorial of merchants of New York and Philadelphia, on which an elaborate report was made by Mr. Mercer, from the Committee on Roads and Canals. The report, in conclusion, proposed a resolution that the President should be requested—to consider the expediency of opening or continuing negotiations with the governments of other nations, and particularly with those the territorial jurisdiction of which comprehends the Isthmus of Panama and to which the United States have accredited ministers or agents, for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of effecting a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus and of securing forever by suitable treaty stipulations the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all nations.

That resolution was unanimously agreed to by the House.

It should be remembered that when this Isthmian Canal question first arose as a national proposition everybody in the United States took the ground that any canal that was constructed must be an international affair in the sense that its use was to be common and equal to all nations. And why? Because the United States was not then one of the stronger powers. It was one of the powers that might be shut out by any other principle, and until very recently nobody ever suggested that there was any other principle fairly applicable to this difficulty, so far as the United States was concerned.

In 1845 a concession was granted by Nicaragua to Louis Napoleon. The United States does not seem to have taken special notice of this.

But in the following year, 1846, the United States negotiated a treaty with New Granada, which shows that our country was watching the canal question and beginning to appreciate the political as well as the commercial aspect. This treaty provided not only for equal rights for the United States, but the United States joined in a guarantee of neutrality, a fact which is important, because this treaty is the foundation upon which the law which governs the present canal ultimately rests. President Polk, in his annual message to Congress, referred to this treaty as follows:

In entering into the mutual guarantees proposed by the thirty-fifth article of the treaty, neither the Government of New Granada nor that of the United States has any narrow or exclusive views. The ultimate object, as presented by the Senate of the United States in their resolution of March 3, 1835, is to secure to all nations the free and equal right of passage over the Isthmus. If the United States, as the chief of the American nations, should first become a party to this guarantee, it can not be doubted, indeed it is confidently expected by the Government of New Granada, that similar guarantees will be given to that Republic by Great Britain and France. Should the proposition thus tendered be rejected, we may deprive the United States of the just influence which its acceptance might secure to them and confer the glory and benefits of being the first among the nations in concluding such an arrangement upon the Government either of Great Britain or France. That either of these Governments would embrace the offer can not be doubted, because there does not appear to be any other effectual means of securing to all nations the advantages of this important passage, but the guaranty of great commercial powers that the Isthmus shall be neutral territory. The interests of the world at stake are so important that the security of this passage between the two oceans can not be suffered to depend upon the wars and revolutions which may arise among different nations.

This brings us down to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. That treaty was made in 1850 by Great Britain in response to the urgent demands of the United States. When our country seriously turned its attention to the matter of joining the two oceans by a canal through the Isthmus, it found Great Britain in possession of the eastern end of the route, which men generally believed would be the most available one for the canal. Thereupon the United States sought a treaty with Great Britain by which that nation would give up the advantage which she had and admit the United States to equal participation with her in the control and protection of a canal across the Isthmus. This resulted in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

By that treaty Great Britain agreed with the United States that neither Government should "ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the ship canal"; that neither should "make use of any protection" which either afforded to a canal "or any alliance which either" might have "with any State or people for the purpose of erecting or maintaining any fortifications, or of occupying, fortifying, or colonizing Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America, or of assuming or exercising dominion over the same," and that neither would "take advantage of any intimacy or use any alliance, connection, or influence that either" might "possess with any State or Government, through whose territory the said canal may pass, for the purpose of acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one, any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other."

This treaty of 1850 declared that its "great design" was "that of constructing and maintaining the said canal as a ship communication between the two oceans for the benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all, and of protecting the same." As the Senator from New York well said in his exhaustive speech on this subject in the Senate last year:

That declaration is the corner stone of the rights of the United States upon the Isthmus of Panama.

The fundamental principle embodied in the treaty of 1850 is to be found in the eighth article, which contains an explicit agreement for equality of treatment to the citizens of the United States and to the citizens of Great Britain in any canal, wherever it may be constructed across the Isthmus. That article reads as follows:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

The spirit of this Clayton-Bulwer treaty will be made clearer if we keep in mind that the United States was the moving party in that matter, and if we also keep before us what the United States asked Great Britain to agree to. That is well expressed in the words of Senator Davis, the chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, as contained in the report from that committee to the Senate dated April 5, 1900. In that report Senator Davis explains that the representative of the United States in urging upon the representative of Great Britain the making of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty assured him that—

> The United States sought no exclusive privilege or preferential right of any kind in regard to the proposed communication, and their sincere wish, if it should be found practicable, was to see it dedicated to the common use of all nations on the most liberal terms and a footing of perfect equality for all. That the United States would not, if they could, obtain any exclusive right or privilege in a great highway which naturally belonged to all mankind.

Years passed and new conditions arose and the United States came to feel that the terms of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which had once been deemed desirous and advantageous, were inapplicable to these new conditions and injurious to the best interests of our Nation, and we undertook to secure a modification of the treaty from Great Britain. There was much discussion in the course of that undertaking and some difference of opinion as to the continued obligations of the treaty. This discussion was finally put at rest by the then Secretary of State in his memorandum on the subject made in the year 1896, in which he said that—> the true remedy is not in ingenious attempts to deny the existence of the treaty or to explain away its provisions, but in a direct and straightforward application to Great Britain for a reconsideration of the whole matter.

Might we not well take this good advice to ourselves at the present time?

Application was made to Great Britain for a reconsideration of the whole matter, and as a result we have the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. At the time this application was made certain representations were made to Great Britain to induce her to modify the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. It is interesting to note some of them. Mr. Blaine, then Secretary of State, in directing our representative to propose the desired modifications to Great Britain, gave the following instructions:

> The United States recognized a proper guaranty of neutrality as essential to the construction and successful operation of any highway across the Isthmus of Panama, and in the last generation every step was taken by this Government that is deemed requisite in the premises. The necessity was foreseen and abundantly provided for long in advance of any possible call for the actual exercise of power. Nor in time of peace does the United States seek to have any exclusive privileges accorded to American ships in respect to precedence or tolls through an interoceanic canal any more than it has sought like privileges for American goods in transit over the Panama Railway under the exclusive control of an American corporation. The extent of the privileges of American citizens and ships is measurable under the treaty of 1846 by those of Colombian citizens and ships. It would be our earnest desire and expectation to see the world's peaceful commerce enjoy the same just, liberal, and rational treatment.

Upon such assurance as that from the United States, Great Britain again abandoned rights which she had and consented to a relinquishment of the provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and entered into this new treaty.

The preamble of this treaty—the Hay-Pauncefote treaty—says that the two Governments involved "being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention * * * have agreed upon * * * the following articles." That general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of the former treaty expressly included, you will remember, a statement to the effect that any isthmian canal was to be "open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms." It therefore seems reasonable to me to believe that the "all-nations" clause of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which is the only clause giving any rights to Great Britain, continues to give to that nation, in the absence of clear language to the contrary, a right that the canal shall be "open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms," a result which is not achieved unless the "all-nations" clause is construed as including the United States.

In article 2 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which is the only place in which rights are given to the United States specifically and not merely as one of "all nations," the rights given are expressly said to be "subject to the provisions of the present treaty." These provisions include certain rules set forth in the treaty and which the United States adopts in making the treaty. Being subject to the provisions of the treaty, which provisions include the rules referred to, it would certainly seem reasonable to believe that the United States is to be one of the "nations observing these rules," and if so it can not, under the very plain terms of the treaty, discriminate in the matter of tolls in favor of its own shipping.

The United States having, in article 3, adopted the so-called all-nations clause as one of the rules taken as a basis of the neutralization of the canal, certainly can not reasonably be considered as without the provisions of that clause, when part of it—namely, the part requiring the rates to be "just and equitable"—is addressed distinctly and peculiarly to the United States.

But it is urged that we are justified in considering the United States exempt from this first rule set down in article 3, because Great Britain has admitted through her representative, Sir Edward Grey, that our Government may do certain things, notwithstanding the fact that the other rules in this article prohibit those very things, and the argument contends that we are either subject to all of the rules or none of them.

It seems to me that the fallacy of that argument is demonstrated in the very note of Sir Edward Grey to which the argument refers. These "rules" were adopted and established "as the basis of the neutralization" of the canal—quoting from the treaty—"substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal."

That treaty reserved to Turkey and to Egypt, as sovereigns of the territory through which the canal was to be constructed, all of the rights that pertained to sovereigns for the protection of their own territory.

But the reservation of those sovereign rights to Egypt and Turkey in the treaty of Constantinople is made subject to "the obligations expressly provided by the clauses of" that treaty, namely, the "rules" as to the operation of the canal.

And this is the way in which the treaty of Constantinople has always been executed. It has never been suggested that, with regard to the conditions laid down for the use of the canal, either Turkey or Egypt should be in a different position from that of any other nation.

Now, Sir Edward Grey has conceded to the United States just such sovereign rights over the Canal Zone as were reserved to Turkey and Egypt in the treaty of Constantinople. Certainly, as he himself points out, no such reservation of sovereign rights could have been included in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, for at the time it was consummated neither party to it had any title to the region which would be traversed by the canal nor any sovereign rights in that region. But the rules which were taken from the treaty of Constantinople for the control of the canal management would necessarily be subject to these rights of sovereignty when they were secured by the United States from the countries owning the territory through which the canal was to be constructed.

The United States having secured those rights of sovereignty should be permitted to exercise them in the spirit of the express language of the treaty of Constantinople, subject to which the rules taken from that treaty must be presumed to be. The exercise of such rights which Great Britain concedes to our Government is therefore in no way inconsistent with the position that our Nation is included within the term "all nations," as contained in the first rule, and is subject to all these rules. In other words, the admission of Great Britain to the effect that the United States, having secured sovereign rights over the Canal Zone, may exercise all the rights that pertain to sovereigns in the protection of their own territory, does not amount to an admission that the United States is not subject to some of the rules in article 3, but is merely construing these rules in the light of the context of the treaty from which they were taken or adopted, and is conceding that those rules, taken as they are from the treaty of Constantinople, are to be read in the light of that treaty, and especially of the sovereign-rights clauses which were not applicable to the situation existing when the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was consummated, and therefore were not incorporated in it in so many words, but which are applicable to the present situation.

This position seems to me to be perfectly consistent with article 4 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, in which it is agreed "that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty," because those high contracting parties agree, under the terms of the previous section, that the basis of that neutralization shall be taken from the "convention of Constantinople, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal," and the neutralization as laid down in that treaty includes these very "sovereignty" clauses I have mentioned.

Therefore, when Great Britain concedes that the United States may exercise sovereign powers for the protection of its territory such as were provided for in the treaty of Constantinople, it is unfortunate, to say the least, for the United States to seize upon that very proper concession, and attempt to show that the making of that concession must result in an unequal application of a set of rules adopted from the treaty in question, all of which rules must be taken in connection with the clause granting sovereign powers.

The principal alteration incorporated in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty changing the previous status which had been established by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was this: Whereas under the former treaty it was impossible for the United States alone to undertake the construction of the canal or maintain for itself any exclusive control or management of it, under the present treaty it is provided that "the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States," and it is further provided that "said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal." But this alteration of the previous status is granted the United States "subject to the provisions of the present treaty"—the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. And what are these provisions to which this privilege is expressly made subject? The general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and the basis of neutralization as adopted from the treaty of Constantinople.

Now, with these express limitations upon the language of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in mind, let us look at the first clause in article 1 again.

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions or charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

And with that language before us, let us glance at the words of the Panama Canal act which are in controversy:

> No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States.

I have been unable to put those two things together and reconcile them.

How can we consider ourselves at liberty to put any construction upon the language of the treaty which violates the controlling declarations of absolute equality between the citizens of Great Britain and the United States as contained in the other treaties expressly referred to?

Does it not seem that this treaty emphasizes equality rather than inequality? It seems so to me. And to quote Prof. Wambaugh again:

> It seems also that the United States may well pride itself both upon being the Nation "adopting these rules," and also upon being included among "all nations observing these rules."

But we are told by those on the other side of this question that the words "observing these rules" take our Nation out of the operation of the rules and indicate clearly that the United States is laying down the rules for all the other nations to follow and promising not to discriminate as between those who do observe the rules, but is not intending to consider herself as bound by them.

Reduced to the language of the street, Mr. Speaker, that plea amounts to nothing more nor less than the cry, "We had our fingers crossed." It can not be that we are going to stoop to that level. It is beneath our dignity as a Nation. Any such construction of that clause is impossible when we remember the repeated protestations made by us during all the years of this canal development, to the effect that we had no thought in connection with the operation of such a canal except such as would mean the absolutely equal use of the canal by the people and by the ships of every nation, and that we "would not if we could" obtain any exclusive right or privilege in connection with the operation of the canal.

I wish to refer to a few of the other arguments that are made in support of those parts of the Panama Canal act which the bill now before us will repeal when adopted.

We are told that the words "on terms of entire equality," as found in the "all-nations" clause, may properly be taken as not including coastwise shipping, and that for that reason the United States is justified in contending that this class of her traffic passing through the canal is without the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Strange to say, that precise question has been determined by the contention of the United States itself concerning the interpretation of another treaty, also with Great Britain, having to do with the canals and channels of the Great Lakes.

By article 27, of the treaty of Washington, of May 6, 1871, Great Britain agreed to urge upon the Dominion of Canada to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the canals in the Dominion "on terms of equality" with the Canadian people.

Certain inequalities of tolls charged in connection with the use of the Welland Canal arose as to certain articles passed through the canal in connection with Canada's domestic commerce. Our Government protested, claiming that the words "on terms of equality" did include both coastwise and foreign commerce, while Canada and Great Britain insisted to the contrary, that the words in question did not include domestic or coastwise trade—exactly the position now taken by those who oppose this bill. This controversy extended through several years and was participated in, and our position as I have stated it was affirmed by two Presidents, three Secretaries of State, and both Houses of Congress, and our Government finally won the point it made and it was admitted by Great Britain that the words "on terms of equality" did include coastwise as well as foreign commerce, and that coastwise trade could not by implication be excepted from such language in any treaty by the nation which desired it. During this controversy many American and British officials took part in it who subsequently participated in the framing and ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. In their work on the latter treaty these men must have had very clearly in mind the construction of this language which had been determined so recently in a controversy arising between these very two powers.

If the language used in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was, on the contrary, to have comprehended the exception of our coastwise trade, would it not have so stated in plain words? In such cases that rule has been followed. For instance, the treaty of the United States with Nicaragua concluded December 1, 1884, known as the Frelinghuysen-Zalaya treaty, contained the provision "equal tolls for the vessels of all nations excepting the vessels of the contracting parties engaged in the coastwise trade."

Wherever it has been desired to exclude coastwise trade from the general language of a treaty as to commerce and navigation, express words to such effect have been inserted. An examination of the treaties of the United States referring to this subject will disclose the fact that the language used is nearly always general and these general terms have been invariably construed to include coastwise commerce within their meaning.

Again it is argued that we are relieved from the obligations of our treaty with Great Britain because the Canal Zone has become our territory. It is not our territory except in trust and the cestui que trust is "all nations observing these rules." We have no more right to discriminate in the matter of tolls or in any other way against one of those nations or its people than a trustee would have to withhold interest on trust funds from his cestui que trust. In article 2 of our treaty with Panama, concluded in 1903, the Republic of Panama "grants to the United States, in perpetuity, the use, occupation, and control of" the so-called Canal Zone, "for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection" of the canal, and for no other purpose whatever. Article 18 of this treaty with Panama reads as follows:

> The canal, when constructed, and the entrances thereto shall be neutral in perpetuity, and shall be opened upon terms provided for by section 1 of article 3, of and in conformity with all the stipulations of the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901.

So we have taken these rights on the Canal Zone for no purpose except the construction and maintenance of a canal in accordance with all the stipulations of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Again, we often hear remarks to the effect that "the canal is our property, it is built with our money, and therefore our ships ought to go through free." Of course there is a very apparent fallacy here. "The canal is our property," meaning the property of the United States, in trust, as I have pointed out. "It was built with our money," meaning the money of the people of the United States, and therefore "our ships should go through free." "Our ships" are the property of a small group of men that make up the most perfectly protected monopoly in the whole country. Does anyone seriously think for a moment that the money that might be saved as a result of free tolls would find its way into any pockets other than those of this very group of men? Not one penny would reach "our" pockets. The fallacy of such a statement needs only to be pointed out to be appreciated.

Mr. Speaker, the United States Government is about to complete the greatest engineering accomplishment of all history, the building of this waterway across the Isthmus of Panama. Every citizen of this Republic may well be proud of this notable achievement. It was a task of immense proportions; but the force of American perseverence, ingenuity, and skill proved to be greater still, and the task is done. Let us not attach to this great work any smallness of vision or narrowness of purpose. May it never be said by any nation of the earth to any other nation who may be about to enter into an agreement with us, "Look out; beware of the United States. Weigh well the words of your contract, or some 'sharp practice' may later reverse its meaning."

I do not wish to be understood, Mr. Speaker, as inferring that those who disagree with me in this matter are guilty of attempting to deliberately repudiate a solemn international pledge. I do not impugn their motives or their intentions; they are honest and sincere in their judgment, and believe that the act we are proposing to amend does no violence to the treaty in question. But in spite of their good intentions I feel that they do lay this Nation open to just such a charge as I have referred to.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct the attention of the Members of this House to the very important words uttered by the Hon. Joseph H. Choate before the New York Chamber of Commerce in February of last year:

It is true—

said he—

that I had something to do with this treaty—

referring to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty—

In the summer of 1901—you will remember that the treaty was ratified by the Senate in November, 1901—I was in England until October, and was in almost daily contact with Lord Pauncefote, who on his side represented Lord Lansdowne, the foreign secretary, and also was in very frequent correspondence with Mr. Hay, our Secretary of State, under whom I was acting. As the lips of both these diplomatists and great patriots, who were each true to his own country and each regardful of the rights of the other, are sealed in death, I think it is quite proper that I should say what I believe both of them, if they were here, would say to-day—that the clause in the Panama Canal act exempting coastwise American shipping from the payment of tolls is in direct violation of the treaty.

Mr. Speaker, we are preparing to celebrate the completion of 100 years of uninterrupted peace between the two greatest nations of the earth, the two nations who are the parties to this treaty. Let us not mar that great event by any act of ours in disregard of the terms of a treaty we have with that nation—an act which has been condemned in such plain terms by our own learned ambassador to Great Britain at the time of the consummation of this treaty, and who was so closely connected with all the events leading up to the making of the treaty and with its ratification, so closely associated with the duly appointed agents of the two nations, the parties to this contract, who deliberately formulated its terms and solemnly executed it. The words of one who has such an intimate knowledge of all the facts entering into the making of this treaty and such a close association with the representatives of both sides should not influence us lightly in this matter.

The other party to this international contract having suggested that we were wrong in exempting our coastwise shipping from tolls in the Panama Canal act, let us not be so blind as even to refuse to admit such a possibility. But let us calmly and carefully consider the matter, and if we are convinced, as I am—and each man must decide the matter for himself—that Great Britain is right, let us be strong enough and big enough and fair enough to admit it, and let us lose no time in correcting our error. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KINDEL].

Mr. KINDEL. Mr. Speaker, the present canal-tolls discussion affords the trans-Mississippi West a fine opportunity to again call the attention of Congress to the denial of commercial equality to which the said section of the country is subjected. The following catechism briefly points out some of the more glaring examples of this discrimination:

Question 1. The entire country pays for the Panama Canal, but who is to get the benefit of free tolls?

Answer. The coastwise shipping interests and vessels (not) owned by the transcontinental railroads.

Question 2. If the Panama Canal is made free to American coastwise traveling ships, why should not the Panama Railroad likewise be made free to American passengers and freight?

Answer. In equity it should be so.

Question 3. If transcontinental coastwise traffic is given preferential rates or subsidy, why is not intermediate and transcontinental all-rail traffic given the same?

Answer. In fairness it should.

Question 4. What benefit is the Panama Canal to people of the one hundredth and the one hundred and tenth meridians?

Answer. Commercially, nope.

Question 5. Why should Mississippi River points—Chicago and St. Louis—be given basic rates and the same be denied to points west of the Missouri River—Denver and Colorado points?

Answer. It should not be so, but the former points have an advantage of 89 cents per 100 pounds on first-class freight over the last-named points when shipping to interior points.

Question 6. Why should Pacific coast points be given transcontinental commodity rates which in many instances are much less than the rates to intermediate points?

Answer. There can be no valid reason.

Question 7. Why should Atlantic coast points be given transcontinental commodity rates on foodstuffs and merchandise which are much less than the rates to intermediate points one-third the distance?

Answer. The excuse for this is that the Interstate Commerce Commission allows the transportation companies to do so.

Question 8. Water competition is alleged to make transportation cheaper, but does it?

Answer. Not when applied to points between the one hundred and fifth and the one hundred and tenth meridians. (See rates to Colorado and Utah points and compare with those of Missouri River and Pacific coast points.)

Question 9. What rule or yardstick is applied to express rates in Colorado, New Mexico, Wyoming, Utah, Idaho, Arizona, Nevada, and Montana, as compared with the express rates east of the Missouri River?

Answer. The rule is at a ratio of 23 to 10.

Question 10. Why do Representatives in Congress complacently stand for it?

Answer. Echo answers, "Why?"

Question 11. How much higher are the parcel-post rates than the express rates east of the Missouri River?

Answer. In thousands of instances the parcel-post rates are 200 per cent higher.

Question 12. What are the comparative rates by parcel post on an 11-pound package from England to Grand Junction, Colo., as compared with the parcel-post rate on the same package from New York to Grand Junction, Colo.?

Answer. The rate from England is 81 cents. The rate from New York is $1.32.

Question 13. What is the passenger rate per mile on the Panama Railroad?

Answer. Five cents per mile to American citizens—soldiers and sailors free.

Question 14. What, in many instances, is the passenger rate ordered by the State railroad commissions in the United States?

Answer. Two cents per mile.

Question 15. What is the parcel-post rate on a 4-pound package—4 pounds being the limit there—between stations in Panama?

Answer. Sixty-four cents.

Question 16. What is the parcel-post rate on a 4-pound package for the same distances in the United States?

Answer. Eight cents.

Question 17. What would be the parcel-post rate on 50 pounds from Colon to Ancon, Panama, the rate for same in the United States for similar distance being but 54 cents?

Answer. Eight dollars.

Question 18. How can Denver and other intermediate points prosper and develop while paying from 100 to 300 per cent higher rates per ton-mile for freight, express, and parcel-post rates than any other city of its size in the Union?

Answer. Only by miracle.

Mr. Speaker, while participating in the dedication of the tallest building in the world—the Woolworth Building, in New York—I conceived the idea of calculating how much more it would cost to ship the material required in its construction from New York to Leadville, a city in the congressional district from which I was elected, than to ship it through Leadville to the Pacific coast, over 1,000 miles farther. I insert here a table showing the penalty that would have to be paid by the people of Leadville on a part of this material in the way of excess freight rates over the Pacific coast if my people desired to erect such a building in Leadville.

If free tolls to coastwise ships should prevail, how much difference will it make in these figures?

What it would cost to-day to take materials in Woolworth Building from New York to San Francisco and from New York to Leadville, Colo.

	Pounds.	Freight rate to San Francisco.	Freight rate to Leadville.	Penalty against Leadville.
Structural steel	48,000,000	$384,000	$528,000	$144,000
Terra cotta	60,000,000	450,000	579,000	129,000
Glass	640,000	5,760	7,680	1,920
Red lead	383,000	3,255	4,404	1,149
Wire and machinery	780,000	9,750	13,650	3,900
Machine tools	80,000	1,400	1,840	440
Electric fans, etc	200,000	3,200	3,860	660
Total	110,083,000	857,365	1,138,434	281,069

Tersely stated, here is the condition this table reveals:

From New York to San Francisco the distance is	miles	3,148
From New York to Leadville the distance is	do	2,192
From New York to San Francisco the total freight charge is		$857,365
From New York to Leadville the total freight charge is		$1,138,434

Distance to Leadville is 30.3 per cent less than to San Francisco.

Freight charge to Leadville is 32.8 per cent greater than to San Francisco.

This remarkable rate adjustment is charged to water competition to Pacific-coast points. Here is another remarkable case of rates from the Atlantic seaboard to interior points west of the Mississippi River which is laid at the door of water competition. What improvement would free tolls make in this?

The rate per 100 pounds, first class, from Fort Worth, Tex., to Clayton, N. Mex., is $1.71. The rate from Fort Worth to Omaha is $1.62, 9 cents lower, though the distance is about one-third greater. Now, on goods shipped from New York via Galveston through Fort Worth to Clayton the rate is $2.34. On the same goods shipped from New York via Galveston, also through Fort Worth, to Omaha the rate is $1.38, or 96 cents less.

All that the trans-Mississippi West asks for is a square deal and no free tolls to one section to the detriment of others.

Therefore, I am glad to be able to avail myself of the opportunity to vote to repeal the canal-toll act, regardless of the wishes of our reversible and not infallible President, Mr. Woodrow Wilson; regardless of the plank in the Democratic platform, which was engineered by Mr. William J. Bryan, who now repudiates it; regardless of the fawning suggestions of our ambassador, Mr. Page, before the English court; regardless of the Mississippi River and coastwise Representatives, whose apparent interest it is to vote for free tolls for the special benefit of their section, to the disadvantage of the interior and northern border sections.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, March 30, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of War, transmitting a redraft of section 5 of the proposed bill for the better protection of national military parks, with a request that it be substituted for said section (H. Doc. No. 578, part 2); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Acting Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $7,500, for the repair and replacement of equipment and material lost and damaged by fire in the Signal Corps Laboratory, Washington, D. C. (H. Doc. No. 866); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10078) authorizing the Secretary of State to invite other nations of the world to participate in the Drainage Congress to be held at Savannah, Ga., in 1914, and to appropriate $10,000 to help defray the expenses thereof, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 465); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

SENATE.

MONDAY, March 30, 1914.

Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D., of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, from whom all holy desires, all sound counsels, and all righteous works do proceed, we bring Thee humble and heartfelt thanks for the abounding gift of Thy love in the hearts of Thy children. Help us, we pray Thee, to be less unworthy of Thy loving-kindness, and grant that, laying aside every weight and the sin that doth so easily beset us, we may run with steadfastness the race that is set before us, in all things looking unto Him who is the author of our salvation. And Thine shall be the praise and the glory now and forevermore. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

ESTIMATE OF APPROPRIATION (S. DOC. NO. 459).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Acting Secretary of War submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the maintenance and operation of the Washington-Alaska military cable and telegraph system for the fiscal year 1915, $496,754.39, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. POMERENE. I present a memorial on behalf of employees of the Government Printing Office, signed by John B. Dickman, president, and George Seibold, secretary, of Columbia Typographical Union, No. 101, of Washington, D. C., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD for the information of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Printing.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Printing and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN APPEAL TO CONGRESS.

(H. R. 6539 and S. 825, Sixty-third Congress.)

For many years past employees of the Government Printing Office, under the law governing leaves of absence, have suffered discrimination, as compared with other departments, in two ways. First, the law granting 30 days' leave of absence has been construed to mean 30 calendar days; and by counting Sundays as leave days, they have been granted but 26 working days. Further, when legal holidays fell within the leave period, such legal holidays have been counted as leave days. Second, the employees of the Government Printing Office receive no sick leave whatever, although they work an hour more per day than they do in the departments.

Under legislation now proposed the first discrimination has been overcome by providing 30 days' leave of absence, "exclusive of Sundays and holidays," but in doing so the committees having charge of the bills seem disposed to frame them in such a way as to result in little, if any, benefit. For example, it is provided that leave of absence shall be paid for at the rate of pay the employee is receiving at the time said leave is granted, instead of providing for the rate of pay he received at the time said leave was earned. During a portion of the year many of the employees of the Government Printing Office are employed at night, at a higher rate of pay than the day rate. During such night employment, which is the busiest season of the year, few, if any, leaves are granted, whereas during the dull season, when the entire force is employed during the daytime, nearly all leave is used, sometimes forced upon the employees, and under the proposed law leave earned at night would be paid for at the day rate.

It is not infrequent that men employed on work calling for a higher rate of pay are transferred to positions calling for a lower rate, and under the proposed law they would be compelled to accept leave, if granted then, at the lower rate, notwithstanding that they earned their leave at the higher rate. If enacted into law, the proposed legislation would put it in the power of the officials of the Government Printing Office to allow leave only at the lowest rate of pay, whether that course were pursued or not, by either transferring employees to lower rates of pay or declining to grant leave when the night force is at work. We do not believe it is the desire of Congress to permit such a condition to arise.

Therefore, in order that exact justice may be done all concerned, we request that the following provisions be enacted:

Thirty days' leave of absence, exclusive of Sundays and holidays, said leave to be paid for at the rate said leave was earned.

Thirty days' sick leave, under the same provisions governing other departments of the Government.

Pro rata leave of absence for what are known as temporary employees. (This provision is contained in House bill 6539, but not in Senate bill 825.)

Another matter to which we would call attention is the tardy recognition of the request of the comparatively few employees known as hand compositors for an increase in compensation, as recommended by the present Public Printer, which, if granted, will be the first they have received for 40 years. Suffering a reduction about 1873, they succeeded in securing a restoration of wages in 1899, but have been granted no increase, notwithstanding the constant increase in the cost of the commodities of life and the many demands to be met in order to maintain a standing commensurate with the dignity of the American workman.

We therefore request that the increase recommended by the Public Printer be included in the law.

Presented by

JOHN B. DICKMAN,
President Columbia Typographical Union No. 101,
GEO. G. SEIBOLD,
Secretary Columbia Typographical Union No. 101,
On behalf of employees of the Government Printing Office.

MINE RESCUE CAR.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, to which was referred the bill (S. 4891) to provide for the purchase and equipment of a mine-rescue car, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 393) thereon.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT MILWAUKEE, WIS.

Mr. STEPHENSON submitted a report (No. 392) to accompany the bill (H. R. 5487) authorizing an additional appropriation for the erection of the United States appraisers' stores building at Milwaukee, Wis., heretofore reported by him.

PUBLIC SCHOOL BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS.

Mr. HOLLIS. From the Committee on the District of Columbia I report back favorably the bill (S. 4316) to regulate the use of public school buildings and grounds in the District of Columbia, and I submit a report (No. 391) thereon. This is known as the civic center bill, and the committee unanimously reports it favorably. As the matter is one of wide public interest and as the report is short, I move that 20,000 additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate document room. I have had an estimate made and 65,000 copies would come within the rule. The cost of 20,000 copies will be approximately $200. I therefore make the motion.

Mr. SMOOT. Has the report been printed?

Mr. HOLLIS. It has been put in type.

Mr. SMOOT. Is it the committee report?

Mr. HOLLIS. It is the committee report.

Mr. SMOOT. Has it been printed as a report?

Mr. HOLLIS. It has only been put in type. I referred it to the Public Printer for an estimate of cost for printing additional copies. He had it set up so that the cost could be estimated. I did not ask to have it set up. It was so printed in advance.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator asks unanimous consent that 20,000 additional copies be printed?

Mr. HOLLIS. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. For the use of the document room?

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HOLLIS. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be put upon its passage at the present time.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it is a bill of sufficient importance to go over one day.

Mr. HOLLIS. The Senator is right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. FALL:

A bill (S. 5090) to amend section 5 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912; to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

A bill (S. 5099) granting an increase of pension to Thomas J. Truss (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 5100) granting an increase of pension to Daniel F. M. Drew; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey:

A bill (S. 5102) providing payment by salary for the auditor of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia in lieu of fees; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BRADLEY (by request):

A bill (S. 5103) to compensate Alfred A. Thresher for the infringement of his letters patent by the United States; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 136) to authorize the appointment of Charles August Meyer as a cadet at the United States Military Academy (with accompanying papers); and

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 137) to authorize the appointment of Clifford Hildebrandt Tate as a cadet at the United States Military Academy (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. FALL. I introduce a bill to amend section 5 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal," and I ask that it may be read in full for information and properly referred.

The bill (S. 5090) to amend section 5 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be is enacted, etc., That section 5 of the act known as the Panama Canal act, approved August 24, 1912, be amended as follows: Strike out period after words "United States," in seventh line, and insert "nor upon vessels belonging to citizens of any country upon this continent and engaged solely in trade between ports of North or South America, or both, and duly registered under the laws of the country of which the owners of said vessel are citizens," so that the sentence as amended will read: "No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States nor upon vessels belonging to citizens of any country upon this continent and engaged solely in trade between ports of North or South America, or both, and duly registered under the laws of the country of which the owners of said vessels are citizens."

Also, amend third paragraph of said section 5 by striking out words "other than for vessels of the United States and its citizens," in lines 4 and 5 from bottom of page, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "except as in the first paragraph of this section provided."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. THOMAS introduced a bill (S. 5101) to amend section 5 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the administration and government of the Canal Zone," which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Friday, the 3d of April, at the close of the routine business, I shall address the Senate upon the subject matter contained in the bill just introduced by me.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. JONES submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to rent or lease to responsible persons or corporations for periods not to exceed 20 years suitable spaces or portions of ground for the construction of summer residences, hotels, stores, for the purpose of increasing the public benefits and public use of the national forests, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURTON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $800 for the installation of mail chutes in the public building at Cleveland, Ohio, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

IMPORTATION OF CONVICT-MADE GOODS.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I enter a motion to reconsider the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] in having House bill 14330 referred to the Committee on Manufactures. I ask unanimous consent that the motion may lie over without prejudice and be regarded as pending until the Senator from Missouri returns to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not understand the motion, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a motion to reconsider the vote whereby a certain bill was referred to the Committee on Manufactures on last Saturday. The Senator from Maryland asks unanimous consent that the motion may lie over without prejudice until the return of the Senator from Missouri. The Chair hears no objection, and it will be so ordered.

MINING ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day.

The SECRETARY. Motion by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] to discharge the Committee on Mines and Mining from the further consideration of the bill (S. 4898) to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, potassium, and sodium on the public domain, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MYERS. I ask that the motion may go over for the day, without prejudice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it goes over without prejudice.

THE REPUBLIC COAL CO.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell or lease certain public lands to the Republic Coal Co., a corporation, was rejected by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it is desirable to have a roll call on the motion. Several Senators interested in it are not here, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	O'Gorman	Smoot
Brady	Hollis	Oliver	Stephenson
Brandegee	Jones	Overman	Sterling
Bristow	Kenyon	Owen	Sutherland
Bryan	Lee, Md.	Page	Thomas
Burton	Lewis	Poindexter	Thornton
Chamberlain	Lippitt	Robinson	Tillman
Clapp	McCumber	Root	Townsend
Clark, Wyo.	McLean	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Colt	Martine, N. J.	Shafroth	Walsh
Dillingham	Myers	Sheppard	Williams
Fall	Nelson	Shively	Works
Gallinger	Newlands	Simmons
Gronna	Norris	Smith, Ga.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The question is upon the motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. NORRIS. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask that the Secretary read the motion that is before the Senate and then state the motion to lay on the table, so that Senators who have come in may know what is before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the motion.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] makes a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell or lease certain public lands to the Republic Coal Co., a corporation, was rejected by the Senate. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] moves to lay that motion on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is, Shall the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table? The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], who is not present. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] and vote "nay."

Mr. SHIVELY (when Mr. KERN's name was called). My colleague [Mr. KERN] is temporarily detained from the Senate on important business. He is paired with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY].

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], who is absent. On that account I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. THORNTON (when Mr. RANSDELL'S name was called). I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. RANSDELL] on account of important public business.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. CULBERSON], who is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT].

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] is absent on account of official business.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SHERMAN], who has been called away upon important public business.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY]. He has a general pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN].

Mr. CRAWFORD (after having voted in the negative). I find that my pair, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], is absent, and that on a former roll call he announced his pair with me. In his absence, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is necessarily out of the city, but that he is paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to state that I have a general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], who has not voted. I therefore withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 29, as follows:

YEAS—27.

Borah	Gore	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	Gronna	Norris	Smoot
Bristow	Jones	Overman	Thomas

So the motion of Mr. WILLIAMS to lay Mr. REED'S motion to reconsider on the table was rejected.

Mr. THOMAS subsequently said: Mr. President, I was recorded as voting "yea" on the last roll call. I so voted under a misapprehension. If it is not too late, I should like to correct it, in view of the fact that it would make no difference in the result.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just one moment——

Mr. THOMAS. If it can not be done under the rules, of course I will not insist upon it; but I do not desire to appear inconsistent in my two votes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was rejected.

Mr. NORRIS. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before in regard to the transfer of my pair, I vote "yea."

Mr. CRAWFORD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when Mr. RANSDELL'S name was called). I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. RANSDELL] on business of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). I make the same announcement with reference to the transfer of my pair which I previously made and vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], and on account of his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] and withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. On this vote I desire to transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST] and vote "nay."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 30, nays 24, as follows:

So the motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate refused to pass the joint resolution was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the status of the joint resolution with reference to the calendar? Does it not come under the rule which appertains with reference to morning business? Can it be taken up out of its order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The opinion of the Chair is that the vote whereby the joint resolution was rejected having been reconsidered, the joint resolution is before the Senate; and the question is, Shall the joint resolution pass? That is the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, regardless of the merits or demerits of this particular joint resolution, before the vote is taken, I wish to say again that my great objection to this joint resolution and to similar measures is that they establish precedents and a rule for granting special privileges of this character by special legislation. It has the same effect as a grant, and the effect of the precedent will be such that it must inevitably lead to abuse. The only way by which we can dispose of the natural resources of the country, or open them to the use of the people properly, is by general legislation which will deal with the entire subject matter and fix the rights and opportunities of all the people upon the same basis.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to say to the Senator from Idaho and to the Senate that there is before one of the committees of the Senate at the present time a general bill providing for the leasing of coal lands. If that bill should be enacted, the necessity for this special legislation would be disposed of. I anticipate that the discussion of this measure again would be somewhat protracted and interfere very much, doubtless, with the regular order before the Senate. Therefore I am going to suggest to my colleague that he consent that the joint resolution go to the calendar, and then if, in the due course of proceedings here within the ensuing month, we shall be able to pass the general bill, it will be unnecessary to accord to the grantee of this joint resolution the privileges which it undertakes to grant.

Mr. BORAH. I think that is a very wise suggestion.

Mr. WALSH. I suggest to my colleague that he take that course.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I make no objection to that suggestion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the joint resolution will go to the calendar. The Chair hears no objection, and the joint resolution goes to the calendar.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 316, submitted by Mr. LEWIS on the 26th instant, which reads as follows:

Resolved, That in pursuance of the true American doctrine of equal and exact justice to all, special privileges to none, that it is expedient and just that all vessels or tonnage passing through the Panama Canal shall bear and pay a sum of compensation so adjusted as shall compensate for expense and upkeep of the canal.

Resolved further, That the amount and method of payment of such tolls shall be regulated jointly by the Secretaries of War and Treasury, with approval of the President of the United States.

To which resolution a substitute is pending, offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] on the 27th instant, which reads as follows:

That in pursuance of the true American doctrine that American interests are safer in the hands of Americans than in the hands of European or other foreign nations, it is the sense of the Senate of the United States that under the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the United States can grant free passage through the Panama Canal to American coastwise vessels, and that any attempted denial of that right by European or other foreign powers is an unwarranted demand on their part, which can not be conceded without a surrender of rights that lie at the foundation of our Government, and which American interests and American honor demand shall be maintained at all hazards.

Resolved further, That there is neither necessity nor justice in repealing the free-tolls provision of the Panama Canal act, the purpose of the exemption being to aid American shipping in its unequal contest with the subsidized shipping of other countries, which will probably include the payment of tolls by those Governments on their vessels passing through the canal.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I desire at the outset to ask the Senate for unanimous consent to have added to my resolution the words:

Provided, That the President shall be empowered to suspend any toll or charge as to any vessel at any time the welfare of the Nation or any portion of the Nation would be served by so doing, and to restore said tolls whenever, in his judgment, necessary to the benefit of the United States.

For the purpose of discussing the thought suggested in a bill introduced by me, embodying those views, I ask unanimous consent of the Senate that those words may be regarded as having been added to my resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. Indeed, I think it is the Senator's privilege to modify the resolution without asking unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be treated as so modified.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Senate for its courtesy.

Mr. President, it must be apparent to those understanding this subject that the object of this resolution was two-fold. One object was to offer the suggestion of a Senator as to a method which he regarded feasible and serviceable to the country in the matter of the application of the tolls. The other I prefer to confess without disguise; it was to offer some course to my own party—if in its judgment consideration could be so granted—that might tender it some medium passage—an intermediate channel between what appears to be a Scylla upon the one side and a Charybdis upon the other. I freely confess that one of my objects in tendering the resolution was that it might serve as a propitious channel for a middle course and thus avoid the party being engulfed in either whirlpool, yet serving the needs suggested by the President.

Then, sir, might I say to the Senate, What is it that is sought in this splendid contention over this subject of exemption of tolls? I use the word "splendid" because the discussion has engaged the very best intellect of as strong a set of men on both sides of this Chamber as has characterized this body. While there is ever a tendency, Mr. President, as we have it from the mouth of Job in his time, to decry the present generation as in bad straits, and to assume that things are not what they were in olden days, justice upon investigation must certify that in point of intellectual merit, honor of character, and patriotism of devotion, there was possibly no body of men which this assembly has ever honored with seats that was superior, all for all, to that which sits here now. Therefore, when I refer to the debate as splendid in its presentation, it is that I reflect due credit upon the investigation, the industry, the genius, and the ability that have characterized the debate, from whatever side contributed.

First, it is contended that it should be the policy of this country that no tolls should be charged to American coastwise vessels going through the Panama Canal. Opposed to this is the contention that no vessel should pass through the canal without paying some toll.

The discussion in some quarters has turned upon the construction of a treaty. In other quarters it has turned upon what is regarded as the equity of the situation. For myself, I am willing to concede the contention from the viewpoint of any of these distinguished gentlemen; and it is no purpose of mine to take issue as to certain phases of the discussion with this qualifying announcement from me that I do not agree with any man who asserts that it is not in the privilege or power of our country to do as we choose with the canal as we might or could with any other property wholly our own. No treaty existing anywhere forbids this, and none could—from my point of view—successfully do so.

The great journals of America have a very serious difference with each other. I recognize the viewpoint from the Pacific coast. The viewpoint from the Pacific coast is led by those very eminent papers characterized as the Hearst papers. Whatever differences of view we may entertain with the owner and editor of those papers upon some questions of polity—and in those differences I participate—Democrats will not forget the sacrifice made by him in 1896 to support policies which were diametrically at variance with all or many of the financial interests possessed by himself and his family; nor the equal burden which he bore in 1900 to serve the Democracy when such was against the interests of the part of the country for which he spoke. This when we opposed the acquisition of the Philippine Islands. Recalling his services, I do not hesitate, as one who speaks as a personal friend, however largely I may differ on public questions—as differed I have and differ again I will—to certify that his genius, courage, and his ability as a journalist—are an intellectual contribution to the present generation.

On the other hand, upon the Atlantic coast the reverse contention exists. The splendid magazines and newspapers, edited by men of great force and great patriotism, contest the position of the Pacific coast, and take a directly contrary view.

THE COMMERCIAL ISSUE.

What has produced this division? The learned Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], on a day past, appropriately referred to that long course of persecution initiated by certain railroad exactions in this country that had called for some form of relief. In answer to the demand, says the Senator, there came the response in the proposal that there should be an elimination of the railroads from the enjoyment of the canal and to dissolve the monopoly which it was charged the roads enjoyed, the able Senator reminded us that the committee added to the main law a provision prohibiting ships owned by railroads from enjoying the canal. This was approved by Congress.

Mr. President and gentlemen of the Senate, it is a deplorable thing that any conditions in this free country could have risen to such volume and power in their exactions and injustice that they could have so aroused the public mind that it does not hesitate to undertake an act fraught with a confessed injustice to its whole people in order to resent an endured outrage suffered at the hands of a part of its people. What is more to be regretted is that in a country like ours, under the guardianship of such men as have been assembled in this body in the past 10 years, sustained by their colleagues in the other Chamber, such institutions could have been permitted, under the protection of law and the policy of the Republic, to have so wound themselves about the Nation that its very freedom seemed to have been throttled, and the Government itself to have been brought to desperation or the brink of destruction.

It must not be forgotten that the Democracy has a right (visiting no calumny or condemnation upon any other source) to reserve to itself the consolation that for years in this body it fought against that very advance, and warned our honorable opponents that if they did not lend aid to stay the tide the very deluge would be upon the Nation, which Senators on both sides of this Chamber have confessed is at the doorways and is prevented from inundating the country only by the rock of national patriotism against which it breaks.

But, sir, shall we in this Chamber, because of this aroused frenzy, fail to recognize the thing that is justice wherever it may be? Shall prejudice so stalk in this assembly, with its frightening mien, as to confuse Members who occupy seats in such a place as this, and that to a point where they will lose their calmness of demeanor and their fairness of conduct? Shall a question of race or nation be permitted so to permeate us that we will decline to regard the great question at issue from the standpoint of, first, justice to mankind; secondly, Democrats, for the preservation of our cause and our party; thirdly, my brother Senators, for the welfare of the greater rights of humanity for which in part for the whole world we are supposed to speak?

There may be other places, there may be the hustings or the platform, where we whip into a fury the mad discord of the populace; and I, regretfully, have participated in that performance; but here may I not say to such as you, as said the attendant to Horatio upon beholding the advancing ghost of Hamlet:

Horatio, thou art an educated man; speak to him.

It is because of the consciousness of that education in the basic rights of man and government that I dare ask that we speak a moment to this confused sentiment.

For myself, Senators, I can not be charged with any prejudice that can be coloring my judgment, nor with any geographical limitation that can be said to be blinding my vision. As nearly as a man could be a cosmopolite upon this subject, I am vain enough to assume that I occupy that arena. If the question be raised asking if I serve English sentiment in my preferences, I would not hesitate to invite consideration of those from whom I sprang; and to the long line of ancestors whose formless dust is mildewed upon the hillsides of a thousand battle fields—where they fell in behalf of the splendid cause of Ireland. If there should be a Burke's Peerage in which my kind and its people should be recorded by Englishmen, the Irish would read that the English recorded us as hereditary foes.

From a point of geography, though born and reared up to young manhood in the South, the early days of my severe struggles in the profession that I had chosen in common with most of the gentlemen who occupy this Chamber—the law—I lived on the Pacific coast; and many men here, who formed a kindly friendship and close intimate association with me in those days, can certify that in the bosom of no man would be found the wish more enthusiastic or the hope more ardent for the welfare of that struggling country than in mine.

Therefore I speak from the point of view, I trust, wholly divorced from the prejudice of geography, or that, sir, of race or nation, in my desire to harmonize what I feel are differences which threaten much in their consequence and which I feel may be avoided in their results.

WHAT THE PRESIDENT SEEKS.

What is requested? It is requested by the President in his message that there be a suspension of the privilege that has heretofore been granted which gave an exemption to a certain class of our countrymen of paying anything for the enjoyment of the canal. In other words, we are confronted with a practical fact. The able Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] manifested in his very full exposition some of the elements, and that I may not weary the Senate by repetition or marring a speech otherwise perfect, I will be content to make a single statement as to the practical allusion.

What is this waterway? Mr. President, from my point of view I never agreed with the policy of constructing the Panama Canal in the manner in which it was or by the means which were adopted. Before the bar associations of my State, honored by them to address them before the subject became illumined with the flame of discord, I propounded the doctrine I held. I said then what I am now saying, that the stroke that gashed the side of the earth through which it was hoped the blood of commerce would flow might some day be clotted with the blood of my countrymen in order that justice and liberty could be preserved as against the assault which would come upon this Republic following that undertaking. I have in nowise qualified that. Much justification now exists for my expressed fear, and more than at the time I prophesied.

Mr. President, there never was a time in our civilization, it appears, when there was not a hope on the part of some one that this waterway should be cut in the Isthmus. It may be interesting to you to know that the quaint and ancient volume known as Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy dared prophesy that the melancholy of mankind, which created so much unrest of spirit, could all be soothed by a canal cut through the Isthmus.

THE COST OF THE CANAL.

From that time on there seem to have been various views upon that question. We have, however, the channel itself carved, and through it the waters are soon to run. Four hundred million dollars is the cost of the enterprise, and that can not be gainsaid. Ten million dollars a year will be the charge for but the interest upon the bonds; that is conceded. Ten million dollars more will be necessary for its upkeep, and $10,000,000 more from time to time will be essential for arms and fortifications, in order to maintain it in a defensive shape. That $450,000,000 will have been expended upon the project before the very eyes of this generation none of us can deny. Therefore if that canal paid all its expenses of operation and earned a million dollars net annually there would be 400 years before it would return to the Nation its mere output.

The Panama Canal is owned by the people of the United States. It will be 54 miles in length, 41 feet deep, and it will take about 12 hours for vessels to pass from ocean to ocean.

To pay for this canal the United States Government has issued—

Eighty-four million six hundred and thirty-one thousand nine hundred and eighty dollars in its bonds bearing interest at rate of 2 per cent per annum, and Fifty million dollars in bonds bearing the rate of 3 per cent per annum.

The cost of the canal in excess of the amount received from the sales of these bonds has been paid from cash in the United States Treasury.

A traffic expert report made to President Taft estimated that 10,500,000 net tonnage would pass through the canal in 1915, of which the coastwise trade was considered as furnishing 1,160,000 tons. The rate of toll as established by President Taft is to be $1.20 per net ton, or, in other words, 10 cents per net ton less than the Suez rate.

Our coastwise trade being free under existing law, this would mean a collection by our Government of about $11,300,000 from the trade going through under tolls. Two million dollars being given to the coast vessels—and increasing to five million yearly—this to put in their treasury and from which the Government is to get not one penny.

The costs of maintenance and operation should not greatly exceed those at Suez. Approximately $5,000,000. This would leave more than $6,000,000 to apply to interest charges, or about 2 per cent on the entire investment, leaving us constantly in debt, increasing yearly to millions and millions.

Is it at all unnatural, then, at a time like this, when the revenues of our country for one reason and another seem to rise and fall with something of uncertainty, that there should be a sense of business suggestion in the mind of every thoughtful man that an enterprise of this kind should be called upon to contribute for its upkeep and sustenance—that the American people should not be wholly taxed in order to bear it from their funds and no relief whatever be given to them from the enterprise itself through those who use it?

Then, sir, it is apparent that the canal can only be sustained by taxes, and since taxes should be uniform, and since on that side of the Chamber where sit my honorable opponents and on this side where sit my confrères it is conceded that taxation should be just and uniform, the exemption of any one set of men from any payment is a manifest wrong to the theory of just government. Where can there be justice in saying that there should be a tax levied upon this Nation for the maintenance of the canal, but that one set of our countrymen using the canal are to be exempt from paying any of that tax? The full extent of that exemption, of course, must fall upon such of the American public who does pay the tax.

Naturally, Mr. President, at the very outset the mind revolts against the special favor established by the privilege. The sense of justice of America demurs to establishing it as a right. All through our country comes the natural sentiment that it is not equality. Equality is a doctrine of democracy. Inequality and privilege are against the very theory upon which we established our Government and strikes against the rock upon which we Democrats have built our church.

So, sir, it is not unnatural that we should have had the protest, and that from the mouths of eminent men, from the pens of learned writers, from the sense of expounded justice there should come now the demand that there should be equality in the enforcement of charges for the enjoyment of a privilege, and this upon all citizens without regard to favoritism.

But, sir, I ask this: If the doctrine I will bring forth should be so arranged as to produce to no man a loss, if it should adjust the full desire of both sides, then what objection can there be to its adoption or to the policy that it suggests?

THE CHARGED VIOLATION OF PLATFORM.

I am met at the outset by my learned friend from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], or rather I take the suggestion, as I remember, of the distinguished Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] and my learned and former comrade, the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], and others who joined at that time in the refrain, to ask whether yielding to the President's request of repealing this exemption was not in violation of the platform?

Mr. President, there is much to be said in support of the contention that when a party writes solemnly a declaration as a principle and goes to the country upon the theory that, if put in power, they will execute that principle as the compensation for confidence, they should be held to absolute obedience.

There are few instances, indeed, which justify an exemption or departure from the pledge. There is but one that I can think of, and that one, unless I do violence to the situation which surrounds us, is the one which is before us at this hour.

What is meant, then, by the theory of the platform and fidelity to its promise? What was it that aroused the indignation of this country to the ignoring of platform pledges and the violation of election promises? It was, Senators, that there grew up in this country a practice that without notice to the country, without warning to the Nation, without a statement of the proposed legislation, laws were passed in direct violation of the doctrine of the platform. All this where no intervening events or new conditions called for the changed course. This was ignoring, on the one hand and violating on the other the platform; but, Mr. President, it could never have been in the minds of our countrymen to have said that merely because a thing was written, that however a reason had arisen in the meantime by which it was found to be inappropriate on the one hand or unjustifiable on the other, that there should be no voice in the land to bring forth the new condition by which our countrymen may behold a new status and contemplate the needed change. In the present case we go to the people's representatives with the reason for the change and ask them to consider the new legislation to be proposed. No silent stealth or deception is practiced on them. We hear the reasons tendered and then are permitted to conclude upon the wisdom of the same.

There lies the difference of the situation, and it does not allow the condemnation that could be well addressed to the policy such as in the mind of the able Senator from New York and others who would apply the same to the present case. I call upon these eminent political historians around me to note the precedents for the course now taken. When Lincoln was President of the United States and there were those gentlemen from the borderland of the North and South who brought him face to face with the compromise platform of 1856 and the plank of 1860, which sought peace even at the expense of temporizing with the principle he—Lincoln—could have said, "I see it. It is within the platform; it is nominated in the bond. I shall give heed to its letter." But, to the contrary, he addressed himself to the new duty as he saw it and declined even to be persuaded or influenced by the consideration of the thing presented. In the atmosphere at the time it was written it might have been justified, but by subsequent events from his point of view he was justified in discarding it and he came with his message to the Congress of the United States presenting his reasons for the departure, and those reasons having been meditated upon by the Representatives and contemplated by public opinion they received the approval of the American public because there was neither deception practiced in the act nor injustice in the execution.

Again, Mr. President, do not forget that in the platform upon the resumption of specie payments, when an effort was made by the distinguished leaders of that eminent party, so splendidly represented in this Chamber to-day, for further compromise and that specie payment to be postponed and some form of repudiation substituted, all because it was written in the platform, the distinguished Republican President declined to yield to such persuasion.

He presented his views adverse to the declaration in a message to the Houses of Congress, and went to the country to find himself sustained in the calm hours of deliberation by the event of time and by the test of reflective judgment.

Shall we overlook the later things in our mind? I refer with a degree of hesitancy to the later illustration which I now propound?

Cleveland was President. It was the year 1893. It was my first participation in large national affairs upon the issue of the tariff. There had been written a plank in the Democratic national platform in order to propitiate the land of the West, where I was then residing. It was such a money plank as would have justified Mr. Cleveland in assuming that by the letter of the contract the Sherman purchasing law—well known as the silver-purchase clause—should stand. He nevertheless submitted his message disclosing to Congress why it should not stand. He gave his reasons to this legislative body. It repealed the law.

From all over the country there came a discussion. I differed then from the wisdom of the course; I differ now; and I have not surrendered my conviction; but I am speaking of the action of the President and my party.

It will be remembered that in 1894 the Democracy condemned the Republicans in different States, and our honorable opponents throughout the States of the West condemned the Democracy because of their opposition; and yet in 1896 Mr. McKinley had his campaign made upon the very issue opposed to the very platform upon which his party obtained power in 1894.

I have my views now, gentlemen of the Senate—I had them then—as to the propriety of the course, the wisdom of the policy, or the justice of adopting it; but I am compelled to say that in the recorded events the American public elected a Republican President upon the issue—and time seems to have justified the course. We adopted then the doctrine suggested now by the President in his message. We are asked to review the plank of the platform and its reasons and consider if new conditions subsequently arisen since the writing of the platform do not demand the adoption of a new policy. The platform is not repudiated, but it is submitted to the people's representatives for consideration as to whether it should not be abandoned if in conflict with other declarations of greater principle and any new conditions subsequently arisen met in such way as shall serve the American interests.

Therefore let it be said that there is nothing new in what the President urges as to manner of its initiation. It seems to have been ever with us.

We will not forget that this question of platform has two uses—one to express doctrines to be enforced; another, gentlemen, has too often been one of sacredness whenever it is desired to use it as an excuse or an expedient to defeat a relief to the people or to avail ourselves of it as the subject of criticism or condemnation of some political act of an opponent. But let us look to one other plain fact; that is, that it is events, not declarations, which make political issues.

HENRY CLAY ON PRESIDENT TYLER.

It was in the United States Senate where Henry Clay, opposing President Tyler upon the question of currency, called attention to the fact—opposing the President as he was—that President Tyler in his veto, or rather in his opposition upon the bank-charter bill as President, was directly in opposition to his own speeches which he had made on the subject and was in violation of his vote when he represented the State of Virginia. "But," said Mr. Clay—and this was in 1841—

> Apprehensions of the imputation of the want of firmness sometimes impels us to perform rash acts, * * * but pride, vanity, egotism, so unamiable and offensive in private life, are vices which partake of crimes in the conduct of public affairs. The unfortunate victim of these passions can not see beyond the little, petty, contemptible circle of his own personal interests—all his thoughts are withdrawn from his country and concentrated on his consistency, his firmness, himself.

Opposing President Tyler as he did, Mr. Clay did not hesitate to recognize that new conditions had risen, and he gave vent very freely to the acknowledgment of his changed position. This example I dare offer to my compatriots in the Senate. I urge the consideration of events which exist about us as justification for modification or the abandonment, if you please, of a mere written expression addressed to conditions superseding the application of the written doctrine.

PROTESTS FROM FOREIGN COUNTRIES. (?)

But my honored friend here to my right, Senator JONES, of Washington, and, I believe, my very able friend from New York, the distinguished Senator, Mr. O'GORMAN, likewise voiced the expression in inquiring of the Senator from Oklahoma, Mr. OWEN, as to whether any country other than Great Britain had protested against free tolls.

For myself, Mr. President, I can not answer from the point of view of one having knowledge. I am not, in this matter, in the personal confidence of the President; I do not know what particular information he has.

But I have to say that the fact that Great Britain only has been heard to protest outwardly is based upon a theory apparently ignored by distinguished Senators for want of opportunity to reflect (pressed as they are with other matters at hand). It is, Great Britain claims, a treaty. A violation, as I read in public magazines, is protested by her on the ground of contract; on the ground of a violation of the letter of a contract; on the ground of the violation of the equity of a contract. As to other nations having no contract, let it be understood that their protest can not come through diplomatic circles in such manner as to be laid before the legislative body—the auxiliary of the President.

Mr. President, at the threshold of the presentation—this one fact the world must understand—the Panama Canal is the property of America. No nation, no people can have privileges therein except as granted by the grace and equity of the United States. We are the sovereign proprietors. No other nation on earth can be recognized as having any sovereign right over this canal, its use or operation, and this assertion is addressed to Great Britain.

COMPLAINT OF BRITAIN.

Great Britain! When we speak of her we pause. What is her complaint, if she have any? I have never been communicated with as to whether Great Britain, through her officers, has a grievance to express, or to the officers of my administration has ever expressed one; but when I hear the words "Great Britain" I decline to reduce the expression to the meaning of "England." My mind refuses, because I can not slander the splendid memory of certain noble men who gave so much of support and succor to this my country in the hour of her severest travail, when before the world she trembled in the balance of the fate of a free or a servile people. Shall I forget that "Great Britain" meant Ireland, with her glorious Burke, in his defense of America? Or Chatham, who in his last moments, when in disease, mantled in the shadow of death, flanneled in the cerements of the grave, found his way to the solemn Parliament that he might raise his voice for this my country when she needed that friendship? Shall I forget, Sheridan, an Irishman and a Briton, with his flaming eloquence, and his poetic genius, fired by the inspiration of justice to the American Colonies? Scotland—shall I not note the contribution of James Wilson? Wales—the contribution of Morris and of all those patriot Britons who pledged their sacred honor, mortgaged their private possessions, and courted bankruptcy to the very verge of personal disaster that they might befriend us, who at that time cried but for justice? Therefore, when I speak of "Britain," I speak of that Britain apart from an England, against whose past I have, as an American, much cause for grievance.

What is her complaint? What can be in the plain face of the treaty and its construction as adopted by all and expressed by Secretary Hay when he submitted it to the Senate, saying:

> The whole theory of the treaty is that the canal is to be an entirely American canal. The enormous cost of constructing it is to be borne by the United States alone. When constructed, it is exclusively the property of the United States, and is to be managed and controlled and defended by it.

And as to American responsibility, saying:

> The United States alone, as the sole owner of the canal, as a purely American enterprise, adopts and prescribes the rules by which the use of the canal shall be regulated, and assumes the entire responsibility and burden of enforcing, without the assistance of Great Britain, or of any other nation, its absolute neutrality.

I will have no injustice done any country, but I will not disguise it that I am not without feeling as to some things England has done through spokesmen, through those who were her official guides, as against my people.

Only a month past, Mr. President, I regret to confess that I was brought to book by some eminent journals of the United States of America, charged with that which I always wish to be free from—bad manners and discourtesy. This was charged to have been committed in a speech that I made in London at the close of the conference on international safety at sea, where I, as the representative of this Senate, was compelled, in the pursuit of an impulse—American within me—to take issue with a distinguished English official uttering expressions that did not seem to me to be in harmony with either the occasion or in justice to my Nation. Therefore I can not be assumed to be prejudiced for England. I regret that there are some conditions and evidences which might establish that I have not even been altogether just; but, sir, I now speak as to the other nations. It is the attitude of other nations on this toll question that more engages my consideration than anything England contends for under any treaty. As to these other nations—Norway, with her shipping interests and her splendid Norsemen yonder in the Northwest of the United States, who have done so much to ripen the soil with industry and truly make it "blossom as the rose"; Sweden, her compatriot, which in the Northwest has contributed so much of government and of ability; she, with her splendid vessels upon the sea, touching every coast and every harbor, likewise has her grievance for discrimination against her; Germany, a friendly nation, whose children dot every point of civilization in America and have contributed with honor and distinction in every phase and avenue which characterizes this Republic, has her feeling of wound because of shutting doors on her by America; France, to whom we ever pay tribute for her friendship in the hour when it was gratuitously rendered in our great and solemn need, moody in her plaint for ignoring her contentions for equality of treatment; Spain, and South America, our neighbors at the south, the friendship of which we should seek and gladly accept, all these to which I refer—what would be their expression of grievance?

Sir, it would be that they would not protest, because, I say, to the able Senator from New York—and I indulge in no empty qualification when I speak of him as "an able Senator," for the State that honors him here with his seat is honored in return by the splendid intelligence and ability which characterize Senator O'GORMAN'S efforts in her behalf—I say to him there is within the grievance that these others would have a more potent cause of antagonism against our Nation than that which England ever could present under a treaty construction, and one of a kind that has twice invited us to the brink of war; so near that it seemed as if the very best wisdom of our leaders and the splendid patriotism of our Nation could not arrest it. What would these offended nations do? They would not officially protest; they would have no right to do so; they claim no contract; but they would charge us with deliberate inequality, with deliberate discrimination in our waters against their ships and shipping. They would then retaliate—retaliate by putting duties upon our splendid foreign tonnage, first in the free cities of Germany and England, the cities of France, Spain, Italy, Norway, Sweden, Austria, and South America. Harbor duties, lading duties, municipal tax duties, all would be taxed on our shipped merchandise, by which it would be impossible for us to land those $800,000,000 foreign trade we now enjoy except at such a cost as would make it impossible to send it upon the seas with profit. It would decay. Its creators suffer incalculable loss—farms and manufactories suffer immeasurable damage.

Shall it be said, sir, that this is but a picture? Then I remind the distinguished Senators who do me the compliment to hear me that that very thing did happen in this Republic. First we set the example. Later, it will be remembered, sir, that in Canada, when the Canadians sought this form of specific exemption in behalf of themselves in reference to the Welland Canal in 1888, in the closing hours of Mr. Cleveland's administration, when by legislation they returned 18 cents out of 20 upon the grain carried for their own people, we promptly retaliated, cutting out of our waters their merchandise by such regulations as we could impose, particularly of the neighboring Sault Ste. Marie Canal. This produced a conflict in international correspondence which came near bringing us to the border of national disruption.

The distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] made reference to a treaty now existing between this country and the Orient, by which there is pledged equality to us in the ports of the oriental cities, the same equality as is granted their commerce.

But, sir, because of our refusal to permit certain equality of citizenship and admission to their natives within this country, they retaliated and discriminated by municipal taxes our merchandise out of their ports. I was honored with an opportunity to investigate by a mission to the Orient, and commissioned to report on the subject. That report clearly indicates, as the Senator has quoted from it, that just such conditions transpired as the Senator from Oklahoma set forth in his splendid presentation of the case. Mr. President, we may inquire where the doctrine of retaliation on the part of these nations against us for discrimination against their ships and tonnage would lead us. First, as I see it, to where our commerce would be stricken from their seas; second, it would awaken discordancy between the nations and ourselves and a destruction of harmonious dealings between their people and ours at home. Such an unfortunate sense of disagreement would set in as would lead to conflict at our doorways; and from that there arises things in their magnitude so much greater that war too frequently is the word to characterize their after consequence. Therefore I say, Why should we pause to make a distinction as to whether Great Britain has made a formal protest, and the only formal protest, if there be conditions because of which others of greater concern to us may make a protest, not formal in writing, but of such powerful potency that, if ignored, might mean such destructive consequences to us?

WHAT DID THE PRESIDENT SEEK IN HIS COVERT EXPRESSIONS?

Mr. President, that brings me to ask what did the President of the United States mean? Able Senators on this floor, eminent Members of the House of Representatives, potent writers for the press, have all propounded the query, What did the President mean by desiring to deal with those "nearer issues," and asking Congress to make this repeal in order that he may know how to deal with nearer issues and with foreign questions? Sir, I do marvel to some degree that the able Executive did not find it compatible with his sense of propriety to enter with more detail and explanation into the things which were in his apprehension. Sir, when I pause to consider that heretofore in the President's messages on the tariff, on the currency, and as to all other matters there was such clearness of object, such fullness of reason, and such irrefutable argument, I can readily ask what produced this strange contrast of the wealth of expression in the many and the poverty of the one in question.

Mr. President, we recall that as governor of New Jersey President Wilson addressed a body of the legislators of that State, saying, "The complaint against me is that I talk too much; that I take everything to the public and have nothing secret," and he gave his reasons why the pending hour, with the important questions of the day, demanded a change, so that there should no longer be secrecy in the affairs of men, but the greatest exposition as to all questions that may be contributed in behalf of the American welfare. Therefore, Mr. President, when I contrast that attitude with this strange exception, I am forced to the conclusion that there was reason so impelling and of a nature so momentous, of a consequence so dire, that, according to the logic of the man, the judgment of the ruler, and the sense of the patriot, it were better, in the language of Bassanio, that he should, "to do a great right, do a little wrong."

FOR MYSELF I OFFER SUFFICIENT REASON TO MYSELF.

But I, for myself, will not hesitate to give what I feel may have been some of the reasons. It may not be tasteful, but I do it; it may not be in consonance with propriety that I enter upon it; it may be questionable according to diplomatic usage that I should detail it; yet, in the words of Hamlet—

I'll cross it though it blast me.

Mr. President, I appeal to a great sacred law as my text. In my fancy I hear again from the sacred pulpits of this country the divine masters of the logic of Christ proclaim: "Be not deceived; God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." Mr. President, what is the sowing that we have done? What is the reaping that is now the harvest that threatens a blight upon this, my country? Sir, at the close of the Spanish-American War, against the advice of the sagest wisdom on the part of the eminent leaders of the party with which I am affiliated and of the eminent leaders of my honorable opponents on the other side, including the former President, Benjamin Harrison, who, in an exhaustive article in the North American Review on the history of the country in the past and prophesying its future—as his last utterance—warned the Nation against a compromise with a principle established by the fathers of the Republic. All warned the Nation that she was about to enter upon a field of such danger as might let loose all the demons of destruction. They said that the new policy of colonial expansion proposed in the Asiatic Continent was beyond the justification of wisdom or defense of patriotism. Nevertheless, as against all warnings and counsel, we entered into the Philippines and began a system of colonial government. Gentlemen on the Republican side who cry "English influence" as the opprobrium to characterize the repeal of toll exemption will not overlook that it was the influence of those who controlled in England by which this Nation was delivered into the colonial policy of an English form of government by a Republican administration.

SOME CERTAIN RESULTS.

What happened? Hardly had you come into office following your adventure, scarcely were you seated, until you met the problems inherited. The cry was: "You have now come into our country; we are Japan; we are China; you have broken down the bars that heretofore confined you; you have struck down the limitations that heretofore chastened and protected you; you have come into the Orient and brought your people and demanded their acceptance by our people in fellowship and protection; now we desire that our people shall go as citizens to your land in your protection and fellowship." We, the United States, reply, "Impossible; we can not consent to that." The exclusion of the Japanese must be forced for the protection of our toiling masses and for the domestic institutions of our land, as we see it. The same is true as to China. These demands were brought upon us one after the other, and we went from one evasion to another seeking some refuge, rather than meet the question face to face, but now it is on us, demanding reciprocity of citizenship or retaliation of nation.

Japan demands that there shall not be the rehabilitation of the treaty of Japanese exclusion which now exists, which, to use the words of the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], former Secretary of State, was "a gentleman's agreement." Japan has demanded that the immigration bill now in the Immigration Committee, seeking to present its face for recognition and its body for approval in this Chamber, shall not pass with prescriptions written in it, leveled specifically against their countrymen. Japan makes this protest claiming that we have estopped ourselves from excluding their people from our country by going into their country, availing ourselves of the privilege of the Orient, and demanding that their privileges and protection of our countrymen shall in their land be equal to that which they extend to their own. Paralysis has set upon us as to the negotiation of the treaty with Japan respecting exclusion and hesitant movement, indeed is ours, respecting the matter of excluding immigration of foreign subjects.

SITUATION IN MEXICO.

Now, sir, on our border, seething with war, is Mexico. One can not estimate accurately the years Mexico has been in some broil, brother with brother, one side against another, in a contest in some form or the other. Heretofore and previously our voice to Mexico was, indeed, potent. Ten times in the history of this Republic a mere pleasant admonition, bearing the assurance of companionship and friendliness, was sufficient to adjure the Mexicans and bring them, if not to terms of tranquillity, at least to some compliance with our request. Now, sir, for the first time since she espoused the cause and form of a Republic she turns deaf ears to the friendly admonitions of the sister neighboring Republic of the United States. Why? We pause—and consider of some things.

Mr. President, if we should now, yielding to clamor demanding that we, in punishment of the attitude Mexico has taken, or because of some grievance which we feel we have suffered, intervene in Mexico and march our Army in Mexico, contemplate the European response. Hear the world's reply to our threat. England says: "Hold, gentlemen; we have our property here to protect." Germany, with its large possessions, says: "Stay, gentlemen; here are our concessions." France, with her large interests and her investments, says: "Stop, gentlemen; you can not come into Mexico." All in chorus cry out, saying, "Now, since you have started, we will protect our own property. We march our army into Mexico and protect our own by our own."

America says: "Hold, Europe! Thus far and no farther; for a doctrine known as the Monroe doctrine, propounded by our founders upon the theory that America would remain ever within America and that Europe or Asia should never come within it, as we should never come within theirs, exists in all its vital principle in America, and our countrymen demand its execution and fulfillment."

Then comes the reply, "Too late, gentlemen. By performance must you be judged, not by declaration. By events, and not by creeds. You have broken your theory down; you have shattered its ideal; you have invaded our precincts, you have stationed yourself in our zones; you have demanded reciprocal rights and privileges; we have yielded them. There you are, fixed and established. You have gone to China; you have participated in the building of a railroad in conjunction with England against China, and in Japan you have likewise made your business alliance. You have gone into the Orient and builded a government, and there you are stationed in civil and military authority. How can you say, when you are now extending over the world, that the world should not extend over you?"

What shall we do? All Europe in its wisdom, all intelligence in its consecrated thought of the world, behold the spectacle and note the complete absence of reply on our part denying the charge against us. The foreign armies of foreign countries remain in Mexico; they remain! What shall we do? The only thing that America would let this Republic ever do—oppose their remaining, as we did Maximillian. Oppose it with Army and Navy; oppose it with sword and fire; oppose it with blood and weapons; with lives of men and patriotism of Nation.

When we oppose it thus—as oppose it we would—what then? I speak to my distinguished and beloved friends the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], chairman of Military Affairs, and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], who pay me such heed as I speak. I note that both of those gentlemen have given great attention to fortifications upon the Pacific coast and have paid great note to the military bill in respect particularly thereto. Natural, wise, and patriotic. Why? All realize our possible predicament. I depict it.

Sir, the very first moment we move down into Mexico with our Army with a view of executing the Monroe doctrine against these foreign nations who have now stationed themselves there, upon the theory that we no longer have a right to execute the doctrine because of our past folly, what happens? Japan, with her grievance, and already with an alliance with Mexico—such an alliance that all Japan, when Huerta's particular representative came to that country, gave him a celebration the like of which was never accorded to any American or Englishman since the foundation of their new dynasty—Japan would promptly seize the Philippine Islands. She would then invest Hawaii. Then, with such conditions pointed out by me, our Army is in Mexico, the canal not finished, no way to have a joinder of our Navy, in what condition would our country be?

I turn to consider the attitude of the other nations. Russia, with her grievances—she who says she lent aid to the American Union at a time when it was threatened with disunion—she who charges that because of English influence the administration in power during the last 10 years lent its aid to Japan against her, Russia; and brought the United States where it gave not only its sympathy but its financial contribution to Japan against her—Russia, remembering this wrong, carrying it brooding in her bosom, with frowning face, as gloomy as the very aspect of death, having already her smoking forts upon the border of Japan, and now in an offensive and defensive alliance of life and death with Japan, this Russia would not lose her opportunity; and with her grievance now so great that she has no treaty with the United States of either companionship or commercial amity, she would promptly aid Japan by seizing Alaska, at the north, near her borders, to embarrass our armies.

Thus, with our defenses divided, with our Navy sailing part to the frigid north as against the enemy, Russia; now, part to the east to protect the Philippine Islands; with the Army divided, part in Mexico and the other part moving to the possessions to protect them; with England feeling, of course, under the surrounding conditions, no friendliness to us (we would not seek her aid, as alliance would be against our policy as it is now against our interest); Canada, her colony on the northern American border, would be without friendship; South America, already imbued with a feeling that her kindred was defrauded when, under the administration of President Roosevelt, we performed a Cæsarian operation upon Colombia and excised from her the government of Panama, and, believing that we are only waiting that we may duplicate the performance upon some other country equally defenseless on the south, South America, together with all Central America bordering the canal, would be furnishing supplies to the European and Oriental enemy and supporting their assault, Mr. President, reflect in what desperate condition our defenses would stand; frightening, indeed, to contemplate.

THE PRESENT STATUS TO MEET ALL THIS.

Sir, what state do we find ourselves in? What present preparation for all this have we? Mr. President, recalling that from where I stand—or, at least, because of the occasion and place—my remarks are to the audience of the world, I pause not to enter into detail discussion as to the form or condition of our preparation. It is sufficient to know that if the emergencies arise we can always be prepared, as prepared we ever have been. That our refrain is ever—

Where breathes the foe but falls before us,
With Freedom's soil beneath our feet,
And Freedom's banner streaming o'er us.

Yet it is the condition that we are actually in to which we now allude. I revert to the fact that in 1845 we had the exact parallel in incident, hour for hour, proving the statement of the great dolorous prophet, that "there is nothing new under the sun." Then, in conflict with Mexico, our President sent Mr. Slidell, as President Wilson has now sent a Mr. Lind, for the very objects and purposes proposed to Mr. Lind; and the foreign nations of the world proceeded in the exact form, only it was over another highway and not the Panama Canal; and at such a time that patriotic President and those in power in this Government saw the situation, and took a similar step that President Wilson now takes.

While I will not charge so distinguished a scholar, so eminent a historian, with having unconsciously appropriated the expressions of a predecessor, it is to be noted in history that the very words of the message of President Wilson now parallels by method the very sense of the message of the President in 1845.

Is it any wonder, then, that Lieut. Meade, the celebrated officer of the Federal Army who met the great and glorious captains of the Confederacy at Gettysburg, proving his ability as officer, and his valor of patriotism, should as a lieutenant of the Mexican War leave his memoirs, which are only now finding light, calling attention to the real reason of the message of the President in 1845, which was that as they were about to proceed to meet conditions in Mexico they were aroused to the fact that they were not ready?

Sir, I speak these sentiments in no confidence of the President. I assume in no wise to speak his reasons. They have not been communicated to me. I assume in no wise the sphere of prophet, as one who might divine the instincts that impel him in this particular. However, for myself I am not in doubt. I would assume, as one with slight experience in matters martial, without credit or distinction, to note what could be meant by the expression "nearer issues." It was that his purpose was that for a while we yield to what he regarded appropriate, that we might rest on our arms, and in the meantime become ready to prepare for that which may be necessary, if necessary it shall be. The President serves his country with notice that any unfair or offensive course by our Nation toward any other could awaken results for which we are unprepared. The President serves one lesson. It is to get ready, fully and completely, by Navy and Army, by defenses and fortifications, by expense and taxes, if we are to continue to exploit strange lands for conquest. Or to save expenses, taxes, complications, embarrassments, and unwilling concessions; come home and stay home, pursuing the course mapped out for a peace-loving, just, American Republic. Then none dares to enter where we forbid!

Shall my distinguished friends on the Republican side over here say the President's demand was extreme? Aye, sir, and perchance it was, my brother Senators. But if you say it was remarkable, I will admit the word. If you say it was perilous as a precedent, I will admit the judgment. I challenge your memory to a more serious precedent. We recall that when Mr. Roosevelt was President, there broke out in Japan the revolt against California and the Northwestern States, growing out of the laws passed to discriminate in the matter of the public schools. So severe grew the conditions, so portentous gathered the cloud, so insistent the demand of Japan for immediate inclusion of her citizens, and for the intervention on the part of the President looking to the repeal of the local laws of these sovereign States, when time did not offer opportunity for preparation immediately otherwise—that President Roosevelt sent to this body a message—aye, a solemn message from a patriot—in which he demanded of Congress that it should naturalize the Japanese, and in the message in 1906 demanded that Congress give to him the Army of the United States, that by mere word of the Executive he could use it in order to execute the objects of his message.

A more striking illustration of despotism in mere declaration has never been recorded in the Government; and yet there is not a man who, knowing the distinguished scholar, Mr. Roosevelt; the patriot soldier, Roosevelt; the statesman, ex-President Roosevelt, does not know that he never intended that such recommendation should ever pass into legislation. It was never his object to naturalize the Japanese universally, and create them in this community a component part of our civilization, producing rivalry in competition with our institutions working the destruction of the domestic hearthstone, to say nothing of creating domestic discord among the toiling masses of our country. Whatever may be Roosevelt's views, differing from him as I do respecting military and civil forms of government, he never would have seriously asked that the Army be put into his hands for disposal without reservation, as in that message. Why was that message?

Sirs, there is no Senator in this body who does not know it was a message of surcease. It had for its object the propitiation of the event, that there might be respite for a little while, biding the time in which the patriotic zeal of our country might be aroused, if necessary; that the calm wisdom of it might be invited to avoid results if possible.

Sir, we passed over these rocks, but we do not forget that in the things to which we now allude there was a reason which was never manifested in speech or declared in writing.

PRESIDENT M'KINLEY—HIS ORDEAL.

When President McKinley was President, with conflict threatened with a southern country when it was a part of Spain, some of the distinguished and eminent gentlemen before me—the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] who is combating me to-day, schooled in the service of this honorable body, replete with its learning and its precedents, justified in all that he shall say respecting the past that lies within his own memory—will recall how the Christian gentleman then President of the United States did all he could to parley, to palter with the event, to reason with the hour, and to stay for a while a condition that he, too, could make terms, apparently, of peace or understanding with European countries, with England, that she might understand that it was not our intention then to possess ourselves of the West Indies, her possessions, as was then charged. To take up with Denmark the proposition that she could be composed, and might know that St. Thomas was not within our intention of appropriation. Through all of these times there were a few who were probably impatient, I, as a Member of Congress from the State of Washington, one of them, misunderstanding the President's purposes. Later suddenly there came forth the great emergency and the President's single request that there should be vested in his discretion $50,000,000 without a reason given, without a purpose ascribed. But was there so little patriotism in the body of my party or in that of our honorable opponents that any man questioned that his purposes were patriotic? No; and to him it was yielded, knowing as men knew that much of that money was to meet contentions which at that time it were wise to dispose of; to the end if we did start the conflict we could enter it with as little friction with outside as necessary and as much opportunity as possible.

Shall it be said, therefore, that we can not understand this situation now? It may be I am wrong, but, sirs, I do not hesitate, speaking for myself, to say that I do surmise that in the mind of the President and his advisers are conditions of so momentous a quality as justify his request, couched as it may be in terms somewhat mysterious, when he asks us to do that thing which justice would demand.

Mr. President, pardon me if I pause. It is 2 o'clock. I should like to have permission to continue a few minutes longer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 120) to provide for the inspection and grading of grain entering into interstate commerce, and to secure uniformity in standards and classification of grain, and for other purposes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask uanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside that the Senator from Illinois may complete his address.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Senate.

Now, Mr. President, I direct the Senate to another portion of this agreeable history. When in the campaign of 1900, as well as in the campaign of 1898, we Democrats found it agreeable to criticize some of the policies of President McKinley, because, among other things, he did not produce nor bring forth reasons which justified them—I shall not enter into specific details—we called that usurpation. We did not hesitate to criticize and in some instances to condemn him. What was the reply then of my honorable opponents on the other side? It was, "He is the President. Trust the President." By his past they appealed, by his record they appealed, by the Christian character of the man they appealed. By his patriotism to the Nation they invoked us to trust him; to all the life he had led they pointed as security. The proof was sufficient. The verdict was sufficient. The country said, "Yes; we trust the man in the performance whom we directed to undertake it." The polls sent the voice of approval.

This is the hour, sir, that we likewise ask that there be trust for the President—trust by America in a Democratic President.

THE RESOLUTION OFFERED.

Mr. President, what is the resolution I offer? I offer a resolution that shall correct what I feel to be the situation in so far as produces friction in my own party and opposition from Members of my opponents. I tender a resolution to express that policy of sovereignty of the United States over the canal forever. That there shall be charged for the use of this canal to those who use it tolls to be sufficient, as shall contribute to the upkeep and maintenance of the canal, that American citizens generally may not be taxed to maintain it out of their purses and property.

Second, that there shall be no exemption by which any are privileged to be exempted from this taxation that another set are compelled to bear. But if it be said that there may arise conditions by which tolls should be suspended in order to protect against railroad exactions or railroad monopoly, I say, yea, I accept the suggestion of the distinguished Senator from New York that that reason is, indeed, a good one, and I then tender in my resolution the privilege that wherever there is manifested to the President the reasons for suspending the law, that justice may be done in any part of this country and it be relieved of any form of monopoly, that such shall be within the President's power.

I recall to the Senate when the coal strike was on in this country in President Roosevelt's term, and the coal monopoly was said to grip the country in its clutches and force it to shiver in cold for the mere need of fuel, President Roosevelt suspended the tariff on coal and brought the coal from British Columbia and from the neighboring possessions along the border on the North Atlantic.

Therefore I tender the precedents and history of exact procedure respecting tonnage and tolls as I propose now for operation. Mr. President—

During the administration of Washington, Congress, by an act approved June 4, 1794 (c. 41), authorized the President, when Congress was not in session, and for a prescribed period, "whenever, in his opinion, the public safety shall so require, to lay an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports of the United States, or upon the ships and vessels of the United States, or the ships and vessels of any foreign nation, under such regulations as the circumstances may require, and to continue or revoke the same, whenever he shall think proper." (1 Stat., 372.)

A subsequent act, approved February 9, 1799 (c. 2, sec. 4), further suspending commercial intercourse with France and its dependencies, contained this section:

"That at any time after the passing of this act, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, if he shall deem it expedient and consistent with the interest of the United States, by his order, to remit and discontinue, for the time being, the restraints and prohibitions aforesaid, either with respect to the French Republic, or to any island, port, or place belonging to the said Republic, with which a commercial intercourse may safely be renewed; and also to revoke such order whenever, in his opinion, the interest of the United States shall require; and he shall be, and hereby is, authorized to make proclamation thereof accordingly." (1 Stat., 613, 615.)

Under the latter act the President issued, June 26, 1799, and May 21, 1800, proclamations declaring it lawful for vessels departing from the United States to enter certain ports of San Domingo. (Works of John Adams, vol. 9, pp. 176, 177.)

An act of March 3, 1815 (c. 77), approved by President Madison, provided that so much of the several acts imposing duties on the tonnage of ships and vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States, as imposed a discriminating duty on tonnage between foreign vessels and vessels of the United States, and between goods imported into the United States in foreign vessels and vessels of the United States, be repealed, so far as the same respected the produce or manufacture of the nation to which such foreign ships or vessels belonged; such repeal to take effect in favor of any foreign nation, "whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that the discriminating or countervailing duties of such foreign nation, so far as they operate to the disadvantage of the United States," had been abolished.

By an act concerning discriminating duties of tonnage and impost, approved January 7, 1824 (ch. 4, sec. 4), it was provided that "upon satisfactory evidence being given to the President of the United States, by the government of any foreign nation, that no discriminating duties of tonnage or impost are imposed or levied within the ports of the said nation upon vessels wholly belonging to citizens of the United States, or upon merchandise, the produce or manufacture thereof, imported in the same, the President is hereby authorized to issue his proclamation, declaring that the foreign discriminating duties of tonnage and impost within the United States are, and shall be, suspended and discontinued, so far as respects the vessels of the said nation, and the merchandise of its produce or manufacture, imported into the United States in the same; the said suspension to take effect from the time of such notification being given to the President of the United States, and to continue so long as the reciprocal exemption of vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, and merchandise as aforesaid, thereon laden shall be continued, and no longer." (4 Stat., 3.) A similar section was embodied in the act of May 24, 1828 (ch. 111), relating to the same subject, which is substantially preserved in section 4228 of the Revised Statutes. (4 Stat., 308.) In execution of these acts proclamations were issued by the Presidents of the United States as follows: Adams, July 1, 1828 (4 Stat. App., 815); Jackson, May 11, 1829; June 3, 1829; September 18, 1830; April 28, 1835; and September 1, 1838 (4 Stat. App., 814, 815, 816; 11 Stat. App., 781, 782); Polk, November 4, 1847 (9 Stat. App., 1001); Fillmore, November 1, 1850 (9 Stat. App., 1004); Buchanan, February 25, 1858 (11 Stat. App., 795); Lincoln, December 16, 1863 (13 Stat. App., 739); Johnson, December 28, 1866, and January 29, 1867 (14 Stat. App., 818, 819); Grant, June 12, 1869; November 20, 1869; February 25, 1871; December 19, 1871; September 4, 1872; and October 30, 1872 (16 Stat. App., 1127, 1130 to 1137; 17 Stat. App., 954, 956, 957); and Hayes, November 30, 1880 (21 Stat., 800).

By the fourteenth section of the act of June 26, 1884, chapter 121, removing certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encouraging the American foreign carrying trade, certain tonnage duties were imposed upon vessels entering the United States from any foreign port or place in North America, Central America, the West India Islands, Bahama Islands, Bermuda Islands, Sandwich Islands, or Newfoundland; and the President was authorized to suspend the collection of so much of those duties, on vessels entering from certain ports, as might be in excess of the tonnage and lighthouse dues, or other equivalent tax or taxes, imposed on American vessels by the Government of the foreign country in which such port was situated, and should, upon the passage of the act "and from time to time thereafter as often as it may become necessary by reason of changes in the laws of the foreign countries above mentioned, indicate by proclamation the ports to which such suspension shall apply, and the rate or rates of tonnage duty, if any, to be collected under such suspension." (23 Stat., 57.) In execution of that act Presidents Arthur and Cleveland issued proclamations suspending the collection of duties on goods arriving from certain designated ports. (23 Stat., 841, 842, 844.)

Mr. President, these policies received affirmance of the Supreme Court of the United States and the ratification of the judicial tribunals each time the subject was brought before the courts, and finally in a late day culminated in full ruling in Field v. Clark (143 U. S. Repts., 680), where President McKinley was justified by the courts in operating under the act known as the "McKinley law," which invested him with authority to suspend the operation of the law under conditions where, in consideration of the welfare of America, it was in his discretion to the best interests of the United States so to do. These doctrines, sir, are maintained on the theory of our national defense and self-preservation.

WHAT OBJECTION CAN BE OFFERED TO TRUSTING PRESIDENT WILSON?

Mr. President, I present to the Senate these legal precedents, that it may see the justification for, and sustain a policy which serves as an outlet to all objections, and yet, sir, serves the purpose the President of the United States has, which I feel I can contemplate with some degree of exactness. What shall be the objection—the reply? It may be that there are those in this country who may say, "Mr. LEWIS, we can not accept the substitution of your doctrine because President Wilson may not at the very time we wish it support your proposition and suspend the tolls, either to accomplish the object of relief or the defense of Nation. Shall some citizen say: We fear that with such a discretion on his part he would not put it in execution. Therefore we can not allow the discretion to be in his keeping."

Why shall such be said, and from whom may such come? Shall my distinguished Irish compatriots in this country have such fear? Then I appeal to them that they look to the history of the man that they may know the tree is only as the twig was bent. His ancestors seem to have recorded their lives as to the traditional English foes. One of them conducted a paper in the United States of America with such assaults upon the policy of England that it was suppressed under the alien and sedition laws of America. Another went to India and published publications in it assailing England and its principles, and he was incarcerated in prison—his establishment confiscated. His whole history, if we can gather it by that which is recorded, seems to have been one long-continued struggle through his ancestry for the same cause of liberty for which the Irishman fights and for which gladly he dies.

Why, then, should any man doubt Wilson, looking at his career in this country from the time, as college president, struggling to strike down the aristocracy of education in order that the humblest student might have personal freedom and the doctrine of democracy of equality enjoyed? Note, too, sir, that in the governorship of his State his action was all against the forms of monopoly and all practices of State toryism.

Why should any man contend that he would not execute that doctrine now? Viewing the record of the man, pausing to record the things he has done for men, remembering the things he has executed for humanity, surely our Republic, contemplating him, could pay him a reverential salutation, adopting the divine one, saying, "This is my beloved son, in whom I am well pleased."

Mr. President, shall anyone say that Democracy can not be trusted and a Democratic administration can not be trusted to execute a policy of fairness to Irishmen and justice to those crying for freedom? Then I appeal to my friends and ask, Who are these Democrats? Are they not the sons of those fathers who upon every battle field from Lexington to Bunker Hill gave their blood as the Revolutionary heroes of this land for American liberty?

Sir, it was the Democracy in 1812 as against all the opposition of the Tories who put the democratic spirit of America in charge of the sea and carried the flag to honor at home and to glory abroad. Sir, this Democracy is changeless.

So there may be no fear of the Democracy, this Democracy that stood by its fellow mankind in the past in every struggle for liberty, as it ever will in every conflict for justice.

So, Mr. President, it will not be the Democracy of which we have fear. We can have no fear of it. It was Irish liberty that was our inspiration when Democracy in the United States was giving its sympathy to the Boers in their fight against England in South Africa. The Irishman will not be deceived by anyone who dares, for partisan advantage, to persuade him that Democracy can be arrayed against his liberty at home or his cause abroad.

CONCLUSION.

Then, sir, what is the predicament? As I bring my remarks to a close I fancy I can present it. It is that we shall yield temporarily to serve that which in the mind of the selected ruler of our country, in the pursuit of the discretion vested in him at the polls, he directs as best for the welfare of our Nation. Sir, my mind for a moment recalls that in 1821, when Daniel Webster was a Member of the House of Representatives, recurring to the cause of Greece, he addressed that famous body at that time with the potent remarks, saying:

> Let not Members here mistake the new idea and the new day. Not by subsidies or honors or weapons of war is justice and right to be done. That hour is fast departing. These in its place rises public opinion, the opinion of mankind, refined and revised by moral law—moral duty that shall feel justice when it is expressed and do it when they see its necessity.

So say I here, sir.

The President of the United States presents us the predicament. He asks that we indulge him, that we trust him. Democracy is appealed to with his past life and his public record. Our Republican friends are appealed to by virtue of his unquestioned patriotism to his country. I likewise appeal to my colleagues and compatriots, because I realize that in our form of government there must be trust in some one, or there must be chaos, confusion, and destruction. I appeal because of the glorious achievements of this administration, for which we Democrats are to be credited. I appeal because of the gloomy clouds overhanging us to-day which to-morrow we can dispel only by calm reason, clear justice, and noblest patriotism.

And, sir, it is patriotism that calls to us as Americans to hold up Woodrow Wilson's hands, to execute the trust America put in him, to trust his judgment, to sustain his efforts, mindful of his past as a guaranty of conduct through his future. Sir, we meet the evil we brought on our Nation by the violation of its guardian precepts. Let us take lesson lest future violations shall strain as does this one of the yesterdays; and, supporting an American President by an American Senate, return so soon as patriotism and justice will permit to the obedience of the teachings of the fathers, to devotion to the tenets of a Republic, and to refuge in a constitutional Government. Then, sirs, we need never again compromise with fear and surrender accommodation to uncertainties; but fixed and firm in our renewed integrity and ancient vigor, we may know that when the sentry of passing years pacing his rounds on the watch tower of civilization, conning the ominous signs of the times, shall hearken to the challenge, "Watchman, what of the night?" there will come from the united hearts of our countrymen the response, saying, "Secure again in the leadership of a just man, a Christian gentleman, and a patriot President, thank God, all is well!"

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has signified his desire to take up a few moments of the time of the Senate in the discussion of the amendment which he offered to the resolution that has just been discussed. For that purpose I ask that the unfinished business may be further temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be further temporarily laid aside. If there be no objection, that order will be made. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Hollis	Owen
Brady	James	Page	Smoot
Brandegee	Johnson	Pittman	Sterling
Bristow	Jones	Poindexter	Sutherland
Burton	Kenyon	Ransdell	Thomas
Chamberlain	La Follette	Robinson	Thompson
Crawford	Lewis	Shafroth	Townsend
Cummins	McCumber	Sheppard	Vardaman
Dillingham	McLean	Shively	Warren
Fall	Martine, N. J.	Simmons	Williams
Gallinger	Myers	Smith, Ga.	Works
Gore	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Gronna	O'Gorman	Smith, Mich.

Mr. PAGE. I was requested to announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the junior senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE], and the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] are absent on official business of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to announce the necessary absence of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and to state that he is paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. SIMMONS. I was requested to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] is absent on official business.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I beg to state with reference to my colleague [Mr. HUGHES] that he is absent on official business. He is paired with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON].

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JAMES in the chair). Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, first I want to thank the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] for his courtesy in further laying aside the unfinished business, in which he is so deeply interested, to give me an opportunity to say a few words on the question now before the Senate. I had hoped that this discussion would have been postponed until the bill pending in another body came to the Senate, but as it is now under consideration I will occupy a few minutes in its discussion.

Mr. President, the agreeable and eloquent Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], whose diction is only equaled by his courtesy, has made what I regard as an ineffectual attempt to persuade the Senate that the honor of the country can only be upheld by the repeal of the free-tolls clause of the Panama Canal act. In criticizing the position of those of us who differ from him the Senator from Illinois has done it in so delightful a manner as to make some of us feel that he has honored us by even touching upon the subject. While I do not agree to the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois that Scylla and Charybdis are promontories, I suggest to him that there are both rocks and whirlpools confronting his party to-day on the great question that he has discussed with such earnestness.

As to the possibility of our country being swallowed up by Great Britain, Germany, Japan, and Russia, as the Senator from Illinois seems to apprehend, if we do not yield to the demands of Great Britain, I must decline to become either excited or alarmed over that contingency, and continue to entertain the belief that the United States will not be ravaged or destroyed because we adhere to the belief that it is our duty to protect our own interests and direct our own affairs without fear or favor from any quarter.

I assume, Mr. President, that the proposed repeal of the free-tolls provision in the Panama Canal act will in due time be before the Senate for full consideration and ultimate action.

That being so, I shall refrain to-day from discussing the main questions involved in the controversy, which I may do later on. For present purposes it is sufficient for me to say in a few plain words, devoid of rhetorical effort, that I am utterly at a loss to understand how so strong a party man as the Senator from Illinois can seriously advocate the repeal of that provision of the existing law.

REPUDIATION OF DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM.

Can it be, Mr. President, that on a great question like this the Democratic Party is ready to repudiate the solemn declaration of their platform, and at the behest of the man who was elected to the Presidency on that platform reverse the action of the Congress when the Panama Canal act was passed? Can it be that the Democratic Party is now ready to repudiate the utterances of Woodrow Wilson when he was the Democratic presidential candidate of that party? If so, we may well despair of ever knowing what the Democratic Party stands for.

I recall the fact that on Friday last the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] did utterly and unreservedly repudiate that plank. While he was talking I wondered whether he was equally prepared to repudiate the other plank in the same platform, which says that—

We favor a single presidential term, * * * and we pledge the candidate of this nomination to this principle.

Certainly if the plank on the free-tolls proposition can be openly repudiated, the plank that I have just quoted can equally be repudiated and probably will be, and who can tell how much of the platform will be left when a Democratic President and a Democratic Congress may be through the process of repudiation?

The Senator from Illinois called Shakespeare to his aid in excusing his repudiation of his party's platform, but I will venture to refer him to another great dramatist who caused Sir Lucius O'Trigger to say, "It would spoil it if you tried to explain it," which is the precise trouble with the Senator from Illinois.

Notwithstanding the plank in the Democratic platform on this subject has been several times quoted in the Senate it is so interesting and instructive that I will quote it again. Here it is in its beauty and simplicity, clothed in language that can not possibly be misunderstood:

We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

Nothing could be more explicit than that language, and it seems incomprehensible to me that on a great national question any Democrat can treat as lightly a declaration of that kind as did the Senator from Oklahoma three days ago, or as the Sentor from Illinois did to-day.

A little more than a month after that platform was adopted a vote was taken in the Senate on the question of striking from the Panama Canal bill the provision relating to free tolls, and it is interesting to note that while 11 Senators, all Republicans, voted in favor of that proposition, 44 Senators voted against it, including 21 Democratic Senators, and it is a still more significant fact that not a single Democrat voted in favor of striking the provision from the bill. Those Democrats who voted in favor of exemption were Senators ASHURST, Bacon, BRYAN, FLETCHER, Johnston of Alabama, MARTIN of Virginia, MARTINE of New Jersey, NEWLANDS, O'GORMAN, OVERMAN, POMERENE, REED, SHIVELY, SIMMONS, SMITH of Arizona, SMITH of Georgia, SMITH of South Carolina, STONE, SWANSON, THORNTON, and WILLIAMS. a distinguished array of men, who, as a rule, give very careful consideration to votes they cast in this body.

Mr. President, I am well aware of the fact that a change has come over the spirit of the dreams of some of our Democratic friends. I noted with interest a few days ago that the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who has the courage of his convictions on all occasions, said:

I have come to the conclusion that I went off upon a law point and lost adherence to a very much greater and more fundamental Democratic principle.

It strikes me that that explanation does not do full justice to the Senator from Mississippi, and is not a very satisfactory explanation of the vote cast by him on the free-tolls question. But however that may be, he now proposes to reverse his position and ally himself with those who agree with the President that the provision ought to be repealed.

I have cited the free-tolls plank in the Democratic platform, and it is interesting in that connection to recall the fact that the platform closed with a declaration in these words:

Our platform is one of principles, which we believe to be essential to our national welfare. Our pledges are made to be kept when in office, as well as relied upon during the campaign.

That sounds like a bugle blast, which doubtless attracted many votes to the standard of the Democratic candidate. Accepting that declaration, Prof. Wilson, during the campaign, gave utterance to the following words:

Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means business. It means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest and honest men who intend to do business along those lines, and who are not waiting to see whether they can catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not.

Mr. President, I can not but wonder whether the present movement to repudiate the platform is intended to catch flies or to catch votes. At any rate, it is really puzzling to understand the process of reasoning that the President adopts, as well as certain Democratic Senators, which leads them to repudiate their utterances of a few months ago, and now openly advocate the unconditional repeal of the free-tolls exemption clause.

REPUDIATION BY THE PRESIDENT AND MR. BRYAN.

On the 13th of May, 1913, less than a month after the Democratic platform was adopted, the Hon. William Jennings Bryan, now Secretary of State, and who is credited with contributing largely to the platform utterances of his party, addressing the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, solemnly declared:

A man who violates a party platform is a criminal; worse than the man who embezzles money.

It would be interesting to know what the views of the distinguished Secretary of State are at the present time on the subject that he discussed before the Legislature of Pennsylvania, it being hinted in the newspapers that he, too, has met with a sudden change of heart on the subject—a change almost as sudden as that which overtook Saul of Tarsus. The President of the United States when a candidate held the same views as Mr. Bryan, but the President has changed his views, for did he not recently declare that—

We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we are right or wrong.

Just think of it, "reverse our action whether we are right or wrong," and that to please a foreign nation, our rival in peace and our possible enemy in war.

Mr. President, as I stated a moment ago, I do not propose at this time to discuss the broad questions involved in the controversy that is now raging in the other House of Congress. It answers my purpose, so far as the present is concerned, to call attention to the changed attitude of some men in public life, which they seem to justify on the ground that our relations with foreign governments require that we shall retreat from the position which was taken after long debate and due deliberation. For myself, I am unaware of any nation that has made a protest except Great Britain, and it is a significant fact that before that protest was made Sir Edward Grey, who represents directly the foreign interests of Great Britain, publicly uttered these words:

As to the proposal that exemption shall be given to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, a more difficult question arises. If the trade could be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic which is reserved for United States vessels would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be made.

That significant statement on the part of Earl Grey justifies one in the belief that Great Britain had received some kind of encouragement from this country before the protest was made. But however that may be, I feel confident that the American people will never be willing to surrender a principle, which lies at the very foundation of our Government, at the behest of any other nation of the earth, that of controlling our own property and our own affairs in our own way. And if the result of the present contest shall be against that view, I venture the prediction that some way will be found later on to remedy the mistake which we are asked to commit.

Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] grew eloquent and indignant on Friday last over the words in the resolution I submitted a few days ago, to the effect "that in pursuance of the true American doctrine American interests are safer in the hands of Americans than in the hands of European or other foreign nations." By some strained and illogical construction of language the Senator from Oklahoma discovered in those words a covert attack upon the President of the United States, but the Senator did not attempt to disprove my statement that our affairs are safer in our own hands than in the hands of foreigners. I still entertain that view.

THE QUESTION OF NATIONAL HONOR.

Mr. President, on the point of national pride and national honor involved in this controversy, I will refer the Senator from Oklahoma to the distinguished senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and the distinguished junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. They are great Democrats, and their views on this subject are entitled to grave and serious consideration. As for myself, I utterly repudiate the suggestion that our national honor is in any way at stake. But above all, Mr. President, I will refer my critic to the consummate Democratic leader of another body, Mr. UNDERWOOD, a man who has the respect equally of Republicans and Democrats. Evidently that great leader does not find that we are sacrificing our honor in upholding the free-tolls provision of the Panama Canal act when he says:

Not for one moment do I believe we have violated a treaty. Our whole difficulty arises from the un-American spirit of surrender that some of our own people have exhibited toward this important question from the very beginning. Can anyone tell us plainly why we surrender, and what is to be accomplished by it? Are we to yield merely because the sentiment of Europe is against us? When has the sentiment of Europe ever been with us about matters of moment? When will the time come when we can expect to maintain and preserve our rights, political and commercial, with the acquiescent sympathy of European Governments? Was Europe with us when we protested against the British Government taxing us without granting representation in the Parliament? Did Europe sympathize with us when we protested against the unlawful seizures and search of vessels in the second decade of the last century? The advocates of Great Britain take the position that we are forbidden to discriminate in favor of our own vessels of commerce, and as vessels of commerce and war are named together, how long will it be before the same advocates of the British contention will advise us that we can not discriminate in favor of our own war vessels? The contention of those advocating the British claim seems almost absurd when we recognize that if we admit them for vessels of commerce the same reasoning will require us to admit them for vessels of war. To do so would convert the canal in time of war into a liability instead of an asset. Of course we made no such contract. We give to all nations observing certain rules adopted by us certain privileges in the canal. That did not mean that we proposed to build a canal at our own expense and then surrender its sovereignty to all other nations.

As to the Democratic platform, this same great leader has this to say:

I have served from one Democratic administration to another; I have never scratched a party ticket; I have always endeavored to live up to and sustain my party's platform. The Democratic Party, not I, wrote this provision as to free tolls into its platform. I believe this plank of the platform is right; there is but one position that I can take, and that is to sustain the position of my party, as expressed in its convention and in its platform.

* * * * * * *

If we have built the canal for the benefit of an American merchant marine and not for the practical exclusive use of foreign shipping, we must adopt a policy of discrimination in favor of American ships or we must in the end pay indirect subsidies to enable our ships to compete with the ships of foreign nations. The subsidies and discriminations that European Governments have given to their shipping interests have practically driven American ships from the seas.

For the reasons given I believe that the Democratic Party was both wise and patriotic when it announced a policy in favor of discriminating in favor of our coastwise ships going through the Panama Canal, and that there is no reason at this time why we should abandon a solemn promise made to the American people in one of the most prominent planks in our party platform.

But we are told that we are violating a solemn treaty made with another nation, and in good faith; that we should abandon the canal to foreign rivals without consent or dispute, in order that we may keep our standing in the family of nations. Not for one moment do I believe that we have violated a treaty right, and not for one moment do I believe that the English Government seriously contends that we have violated a treaty right. Our whole difficulty in the matter arises from the un-American spirit of surrender that some of our own people have exhibited toward this important question from the very beginning.

Mr. President, those utterances of a great Democratic leader I commend to the Senator from Illinois. The fact is the people of the country are not indifferent to what is going on in the Halls of Congress, and in due time the people will be heard from on this great question.

The Washington Post, a newspaper that has never been allied with the Republican Party, in its issue of Saturday last treats this subject so ably that I will introduce a portion of the leading editorial. The article is as follows:

ON THE BRINK OF DEFEAT AND DISASTER.

The repeal of the tolls exemption involves our national affairs to such an extent that partisanship becomes at once subordinated to patriotism.

It was recognized as such a national affair in 1912 that the Democratic and the Progressive Parties gave their pledges to the people that our coastwise commerce should be free from tolls, and the Republican candidate, for himself and his party, made his position clear as distinctly in favor of such freedom.

Less than two years ago this freedom from tolls of our coastwise commerce was the creed of the Nation, the profession of faith of the three candidates for the Presidency, and was ratified by the votes of more than 13,500,000 of our citizens.

Freedom from tolls for our coastwise vessels was thereby made a national policy in a most positive and unmistakable manner.

There was not an uncertain note to Gov. Wilson's strenuous approval of that policy.

There was not the slightest doubt in the words of Col. Roosevelt stating his position and approval of tolls exemption.

* * * Judge Taft, in his honesty, integrity, and his frank dealing with the people, promptly placed himself and his party right in line with the national sentiment.

If there was one single policy of the campaign of 1912 upon which candidates, parties, and voters were in accord it was that of tolls exemption for the coastwise vessels of the United States.

Democratic Senators and Democratic Representatives were elected upon the party pledges and hold their seats by reason of the promises to the people.

They are directly responsible to the voters for the carrying out of those pledges—just as responsible as the President and the members of the Cabinet.

The promises of the platform were a contract with the people, and they are not to be violated through a change of opinion of one man nor of a score of leaders.

If ever there was a campaign in which devotion to the people's interest was pledged by Democratic candidates it was the campaign of 1912. Now, when the party has been in office but a year, for the congressional leaders to be called upon to repudiate the party's pledge, to repeal the law which gives power to that pledge, leads unmistakably to party disaster and defeat if they acquiesce.

With all due respect to the President, believing that he is convinced he is right in his change of opinion, we can not accept his conclusions without being advised of his reasons for such a complete reversal of his own position upon this subject.

The American people have constructed the canal at a cost of $400,000,000, with an annual charge of $16,000,000.

They paid France the cash for France's interests; they have paid Panama. Great Britain contributed not a shilling to its construction, and now to be informed that our domestic commerce, our coastwise trade, must pay tolls by reason of any demand by a foreign country, or to pay tolls in order to maintain international relations with any country, or to pay tolls to promote international friendship or to avoid international entanglements is a form of tribute our Republic will never assume.

The honor of the Republic is as safe from tarnish or stain in the keeping of the millions of American citizens as it is in that of public men.

A CLOSING WORD.

Mr. President, I can not close without a word in reference to the questions of coastwise shipping, discriminating duties, and subsidies.

It has been argued during this debate that the coastwise shipping of the United States is protected by law against the shipping of all other countries and hence is a monopoly. Our law on that subject is precisely the same as the laws of many other nations. For instance, paragraph 8, article 2, of the convention of 1815 between this country and Great Britain provides:

It is also understood that the permission granted by this article is not to extend to allow the vessels of the United States to carry on any part of the coasting trade of the said British territories.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the date of that?

Mr. GALLINGER. Eighteen hundred and fifteen.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is what I thought. But the ships of all nations are admitted to the coastwise trade of Great Britain now.

Mr. GALLINGER. That may be so now, but it will be seen that England originally made her coasting trade a thing apart from the foreign trade, just as we did in the early days, which we still adhere to, and as we desire to do in the matter of the Panama Canal. Does anyone pretend to argue that if Great Britain had at her own expense built a canal on her own territory, costing $400,000,000, she would be imposing tolls on her own coastwise ships passing through it? I do not believe anybody seriously entertains that view.

It is also argued that our national honor is involved in keeping inviolate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Beyond a question that is so, and in that connection I venture to suggest that comparatively few people really believe that we are not doing so when we exempt our coastwise vessels from paying tolls. The President virtually admits that we have that right when he advises us to repeal the law, whether we are right or wrong. The Senator from Mississippi a few days ago admitted that we have the right to do so, and the learned senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who is so well informed on international affairs, admits that we have clearly the right under the treaty, but he thinks that as a matter of policy and comity between the nations we ought not to enforce the right.

OBSERVANCE OF TREATIES BY GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. President, I am aware of the fact that the violation of treaties by Great Britain does not fully justify us in doing the same thing. Great Britain has been frequently guilty of violating treaties with the United States. In that connection it is interesting to recall the fact that in the treaty we entered into with Great Britain on July 3, 1815, which was prolonged by the conventions of 1818 and 1827, it is provided, in paragraph 2, article 2, that—

No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States nor in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same port on British vessels.

Notwithstanding that convention, I understand that the port charge at Bristol, England, on an American ship to-day is 56 cents per ton; for British ships, 20 cents per ton. In Liverpool the harbor rate is 33 cents per ton for American ships and 9 cents per ton for British coasters.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JAMES in the chair). Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It was suggested by the Senator from Mississippi that in the fifties, I believe, or somewhere about that time, Great Britain had removed all of these discriminatory charges. I should like to know if the Senator from New Hampshire is advised as to that?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am under the impression that the coastwise shipping of Great Britain is now open on equal terms to our vessels, but everybody knows that we can not run ships successfully in competition with the cheap, subsidized tramp steamers of Great Britain, hence the privilege is of no value to us. That Great Britain does discriminate in her port charges between long and short voyages is undeniably true, and that operates to the disadvantage of our ships which reach British ports, as they necessarily make long trans-Atlantic voyages. On the other hand, we make no discrimination between our coastwise ships and British ships which cross the Atlantic.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, as the Senator from Oregon referred to my statement——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is what I understood the Senator to say.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What I said was that all ships are admitted to the coastwise trade of Great Britain. You can take a ship over there right now from this country and engage in her coastwise trade.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator from New Hampshire again?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to ask the Senator from Mississippi if any discrimination is made whatsoever, either along the coast or in any of the harbors of Great Britain, against American or any other foreign vessels?

Mr. WILLIAMS. England makes a discrimination, as I understand, although I am not sure that I am right, as to harbor dues, and so forth, between ships that are engaged in the coastwise traffic and those that are engaged in the deep-sea traffic.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, England takes care of herself always, and, in open violation of the treaty to which I have already referred, imposes a higher rate of duties in her ports upon American vessels in the foreign trade than she applies to her own vessels engaged in the coastwise trade. As to our being permitted to take ships across the ocean and engage in the coastwise trade of Great Britain, everybody knows that we can not do that profitably.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think the Senator will find that that discrimination is in favor of all ships engaged in the coastwise trade as against ships engaged in the deep-sea trade. Upon that I am not sure; I may be mistaken about it.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is undoubtedly true, and it goes to prove that England is taking pretty good care of her coastwise trade. There is no doubt about that. I might add, Mr. President, that the record shows that Great Britain on many occasions has violated treaties with this country, which we are now asked to regard as sacred instruments, even when their provisions do not apply to the United States. Thus does England keep her agreements with us. It is also interesting to note the fact that in the only case that has been brought before the Supreme Court of the United States in reference to exemption of coastwise vessels from the same charges that were made upon foreign vessels, the test being upon a law passed by the State of Texas imposing pilotage charges upon all foreign vessels, but excepting vessels in the coasting trade of the United States, the decision was in favor of the exemption of coastwise vessels. The present distinguished Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States [Justice White] rendered the opinion in that case, the syllabus being as follows:

A State pilotage law subjecting all vessels, domestic and foreign, engaged in foreign trade, to pilotage regulations, but which exempts pursuant to law coastwise steam vessels of the United States, is not in conflict with provisions in the treaty between the United States and Great Britain to the effect that British vessels shall not be subject to any higher or other charges than vessels of the United States.

This decision clearly shows that the Supreme Court of the United States held that the regulation of coastwise commerce does not concern vessels in the foreign trade.

DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

Mr. President, during all the debates on the bill proposed by the Merchant Marine Commission of 1904, of which I was chairman, and in all the efforts to secure aid for American shipping, either by a direct subsidy or by enlargement of the ocean mail act of 1891, it was insisted upon by Democrats in both Houses of Congress that the proper way to rehabilitate the American merchant marine was to return to the discriminating-duties policy of the early days of the Republic, as advocated by Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and other leading men of that day. Under that law more than 90 per cent of our commerce was carried in American bottoms, while to-day only about 9 per cent is so carried. It would thus seem that a return to that system, if practicable, would be both wise and expedient. It will be recalled that in the Underwood-Simmons tariff law a provision was inserted granting a discrimination of 5 per cent in favor of goods carried in American bottoms. But it will also be recalled that, at the suggestion of the Attorney General, the provision has in some way been suspended, on the ground that it is in violation of the terms of a commercial treaty between this country and Great Britain. I have never understood how a Cabinet officer could suspend a provision of law, but it has been done. The truth is that even if it could be enforced, the free list has been extended to such an extent that very little advantage would accrue to American ships in their trade between this country and South America, Australasia, and the Orient, and hence some other means for the upbuilding of the American merchant marine will of necessity have to be devised. The most we can hope for at the present time is to give every possible advantage to our coastwise shipping through the Panama Canal.

As for the development and increase of our shipping engaged in foreign trade, there is little encouragement in sight. We have spent millions upon millions to deepen harbors and build wharves for the steamships of foreign governments, which enables them to take a toll of between two hundred and three hundred millions of dollars annually from the American people, but in the face of that it is now solemnly proposed to tax our coastwise ships for the privilege of passing through our own canal.

SUBSIDIES.

In the matter of subsidies it is important to recall the fact that England solemnly agreed to a treaty which provided that there should be no discrimination in port charges as between the two countries, and thus we surrendered our right to continue the discriminating-duties policy; but Great Britain not only now discriminates in port charges, but she grants enormous subsidies to her shipping, thus creating a discrimination that has almost entirely swept our vessels from the oceans of the world. To-day Great Britain and her colonies are paying subsidies amounting in the aggregate to $9,689,384 annually, and the subsidies paid annually to all the ships of foreign countries, including Great Britain, reached a grand total of $46,907,220, according to the last available figures. It will thus be seen that we are laboring under a handicap that in some way must be ameliorated before we can successfully compete in the ocean-carrying trade. For the present let us at least protect our coastwise commerce to the full extent that the laws of the United States warrant us in doing.

The shipping subsidies, mail pay, bounties, and so forth, paid by the various countries is as follows, taken from official records:

Great Britain and colonies:
Subsidies and mail pay (British postmaster general, 1908)	$3,320,454
Cunard admiralty subvention (1909)	729,000

Grand total	45,224,513

Outside of Europe and Japan subsidies and mail payments have been reported as follows: Chile, $253,195; Mexico, $75,000; Egypt, $54,512; Brazil, $1,300,000; in all, $1,682,707, making with the above a total of $46,907,220.

Mr. President, much more might be said, but for the present I refrain. Let the resolution that the Senator from Illinois introduced and the substitute I offered either go to the calendar or be referred to the able Committee on Interoceanic Canals, for their careful and mature consideration, and later on, when the bill repealing the free-tolls provision is before the Senate, further discussion can and will be participated in. This is a great question, the wise solution of which will have much to do, for good or for bad, with the future development of the trade and commerce of the United States, and unless I am mistaken it will have much to do with the future of political parties in this country. A leading newspaper of this morning well says:

> The political party that yields on this question, thereby surrendering an inherent American right, will go out of business. The American people will never submit to such a bartering away of their rights and privileges.

Mr. President, I believe that that newspaper uttered the solemn truth in the words I have quoted. I still indulge in the hope, faint though it may be, that the American Congress will be wise enough to refuse at the behest of any man or any nation to repeal the toll-exemption provision of the Panama Canal act, which was placed there by an almost unanimous vote of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the Senator from New Hampshire takes his seat, for I know he does not want to mislead the country——

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not the least intention of doing so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He has made the statement that he understands that a certain provision of the tariff law has been suspended. It is true that the Underwood-Simmons bill did discriminate in point of duties to the extent of 5 per cent between importations in American bottoms and importations in foreign bottoms; but it is also true—the Senator from New Hampshire temporarily lost sight of the fact, probably—that in conference, on account of the division between the two Houses, a provision was inserted that this was to take effect in so far as it did not affect any existing treaties of the United States. There was not only a treaty with Great Britain, but, if my memory serves me correctly, there were 19 other treaties with other countries——

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; nearly 30.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And it was thought by the Attorney General that these treaties were violated by the provision.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is correct in that statement, which I failed to state accurately. The Attorney General did call attention to that fact, and for that reason the provision in the law was not put in force.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not want the impression to go to the country that a member of the Cabinet had arbitrarily suspended a law.

Mr. GALLINGER. He could not do that, as I have suggested; but the fact is that the provision which our Democratic friends insisted was of so much moment and would rehabilitate the American merchant marine, and which some of us have insisted on in season and out of season, as did the Merchant Marine Commission, could not possibly accomplish that result, has been surrendered by our Democratic friends; and unless we denounce treaties with more countries than the Senator has suggested—because I think there are nearly 30 of them in all, big and little——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have forgotten the number.

Mr. GALLINGER. We never can again test that ancient custom which worked so well in the early days of the Republic, and hence I can see no relief to our foreign shipping. We are now competing on the oceans of the world—not to any great extent, I regret to say—with Great Britain, Japan, France, Germany, Russia, and Italy, which nations are giving enormous subsidies to their ships; and as the result of our Government refusing to grant subsidy in any form to American shipping we are being driven from the seas. Only four American ships are engaged in the foreign trade of the North Atlantic. There are but two or three American ships running across the Pacific to Australasia and the Orient, and I understand that they are kept in operation only because New Zealand, a foreign colony, adds a contribution to the ocean mail pay they receive from our Government. It is a pitiable spectacle, and it is a spectacle that, in my opinion, the American people will not always tolerate; they will find some remedy for it—I do not know in what form it will come—but for the present all we can do to aid American shipping is to give our coastwise ships passing through the Panama Canal the full benefit of our laws, enacted nearly one hundred years ago, which undeniably includes the right of free passage through that great waterway.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I think it only fair to the Democratic Party that along with the toll-exemption plank, which the Senator from New Hampshire so strenuously presses, there should be put also in the RECORD the other declarations of the various platforms of the Democratic Party in recent years which denounce subsidies and bounties. This particular platform of 1912 not only contained the plank which the Senator has read with such unction, to wit—

> We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal—

But it contains also another plank immediately preceding it, to wit:

> We believe in fostering, by constitutional regulation of commerce, the growth of a merchant marine, which shall develop and strengthen the commercial ties which bind us to our sister Republics of the south, but without imposing additional burdens upon the people and without bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury.

The distinguished Senator from New Hampshire very frankly conceded that this toll exemption was in effect a subsidy.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Can the Senator find in any Democratic platform—and I will allow him to go back just as far as he pleases—any denunciation of the exemption of our coastwise shipping from competition with foreign shipping? If it be a subsidy, the Democratic Party has been very remiss in discovering that fact and making some kind of pronouncement against it.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the Democratic Party has always been opposed to subsidies, and the Senator himself on last Friday conceded that this exemption was "exactly the same" as a subsidy (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 5594). The Democratic Party has always stood for equal rights to all and special privileges to none. It is a maxim of Democracy. In the particular platform of 1912 there is an express denunciation of subsidies, as I have just shown, immediately preceding toll exemption. So there is a conflict in the platform of 1912 itself, denouncing subsidies on the one hand, and then immediately proposing to grant ship subsidies in obscure terms on the other hand.

Mr. GALLINGER rose.

Mr. OWEN. If the Senator pleases, I must be allowed to present this matter without interruption until I get through. Then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly. I ask pardon of the Senator. I did not mean to interrupt him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma declines to yield.

Mr. OWEN. I wish to be permitted to present, in a coherent way, an answer to the Senator without having the argument distracted and led off by him into various bypaths which will make the argument itself unintelligible and worthless.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I must decline to yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I rise to a point of order, if the Senator declines to yield.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; I decline to yield. The Senator can make his point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota will state his point of order.

Mr. McCUMBER. The point of order is that the unfinished business was temporarily laid aside in order that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] might conclude his remarks upon the Panama Canal tolls question. The Senator from New Hampshire having concluded his remarks, the unfinished business properly comes before the Senate.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator is within his parliamentary rights, in my opinion, in taking the Senator from Oklahoma off the floor by that point of order.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it was not my intention to do so, but I thought the Senator was a little lacking in his usual courtesy in not allowing me at least to suggest to him that the unfinished business had been temporarily laid aside, and that a Senator was waiting in order to discuss that business and to ask the Senator from Oklahoma how long a time he would desire on this matter. That is what I was going to ask.

Mr. OWEN. I beg the pardon of the Senator. I did not understand the purpose of his inquiry. I thought it was simply to discuss the merits of the matter. If I had understood his purpose I should, of course, have yielded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from North Dakota insists upon his point of order, the unfinished business will be laid before the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. I shall not insist upon it if the Senator's remarks are to be brief.

Mr. OWEN. It will only take me 10 or 15 minutes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I only asked to interrupt the Senator for the very purpose of making that suggestion.

Mr. OWEN. But I would rather make no argument at all than not to be allowed to make it in a coherent fashion.

Mr. McCUMBER. How long does the Senator desire?

Mr. OWEN. I should think about 15 minutes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask if the Senator will not allow the matter to go over, as the whole matter will have to go over, so that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] may proceed with his argument.

Mr. OWEN. I will yield the floor if the Senator desires it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am not asking it. If it is agreeable to the Senator from South Dakota, it is to me.

Mr. STERLING. It is agreeable to me.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask, then, that the unfinished business may be further temporarily laid aside, in order that the Senator from Oklahoma may conclude his remarks upon the subject he is now discussing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, before agreeing to the unanimous consent, let me ask the Senator from North Dakota if the unanimous-consent agreement does not include acting upon the resolution if nobody cares to speak upon it any further.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should hope not at the present time, Mr. President. I did not wish to go that far, because some of us may wish to discuss the same resolution to-morrow.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I say, if there is no further discussion, if no one wants to discuss it, is there any objection to acting upon the resolution?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think there are others who will desire to have it go over.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, when a member of a party finds himself with a platform which declares on the one side that there shall be no subsidy, and in another part of the platform, immediately following, that there shall be a subsidy, he is necessarily face to face with the alternative of deciding in favor of one or the other. Therefore it is the most natural thing in the world that those Democrats who really believe in the general policy of the party of "no subsidy" should prefer to follow the general principle which always has been laid down by the party platform, and by the principles which have always beeen taught by the party.

The Democratic platform of 1908 declares:

We believe in the upbuilding of the American merchant marine without new or additional burdens upon the people and without bounties from the Public Treasury.

The platform of 1904 reads:

We denounce the ship-subsidy bill recently passed by the United States Senate as an iniquitous appropriation of public funds for private purposes and a wasteful, illogical, and useless attempt to overcome by subsidy the obstructions raised by Republican legislation to the growth and development of American commerce on the sea.

We favor the upbuilding of a merchant marine without new or additional burdens upon the people and without bounties from the Public Treasury.

I might go back to other previous declarations of the Democratic platforms denouncing subsidies and denouncing bounties, but these planks are enough.

Even the Republican Party, when they granted the sugar bounty some years ago, were compelled to recede from that position because of the opposition of the people of the United States to bounties in taking money out of the Public Treasury for private purposes.

In this case the subsidies which are proposed to be granted by remitting the tolls through the Panama Canal are peculiarly objectionable and outrageous, because the great lines of shipping on the seacoast have parceled out the Atlantic seaports and the seaports of the Pacific, I am informed, among themselves, so that they have in effect practically destroyed competition in the shipping between the ports. They have also a monopoly by law in that 95 per cent of the shipping is in two companies. I understand, in a well-organized commercial monopoly, they are granted the exclusive right of transportation by ships from one port to another on the Atlantic coast, or at least exclusive of all foreign shipping. We do not follow the English custom, which allows any ship in the world to engage in coastwise traffic; but these boats have a monopoly, and they are using the monopoly to extort from the people on the Atlantic seaboard unfair freight rates because of their monopoly.

Not content with that under advantage by law, excluding foreign competition which they ought not to have, which ought to be taken away from them by statute, they have busied themselves with creating alleged public sentiment, bringing pressure to bear upon Congressmen and Senators and public men and upon various political conventions—for example, the national convention of the Democratic Party, the national convention of the Progressive Party—they have been sending circular letters all over the country, getting resolutions presented before various civic bodies that they might hope to influence; having speeches made by their strikers, and so forth, and now they would like to delay action upon this matter until they can further work up this artificial public sentiment.

Why, with one-thousandth part of the people in favor of this odious privilege and monopoly they could send in 90,000 petitions to the Senate demanding this privilege for the few at the expense of the many. I am not in the least concerned about any of the petitions which are sent to me from this quarter, nor about their inspired letters. This modern lobby game is well understood by nearly every experienced public servant. I was justified in calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that not a single State in the Union, through its convention of any party, has demanded this privilege of exemption from tolls, this subsidy from the public treasury for the benefit of the coastwise shipping monopoly.

The shipping monopoly's agents busy themselves denouncing the public men who stand for the general welfare, charging them with being pro-British, charging them with giving up American rights to British hands, charging them with tearing down American rights at the demand of foreign powers, and trying in that way to prejudice the public mind and mislead public men. Such deceitful abuse demonstrates the poverty and weakness of their case. Scurrility is the refuge of defeated argument.

We have a right to inquire how this absurd contradiction of a proposal for a subsidy in a platform denouncing "subsidy" found its way into the Democratic national platform; and we have a right, as soon as we can lay our hands upon it, to repeal this law which violates the fundamental doctrines of Democracy and fair play.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Would the Senator be in favor likewise of repealing the law, which has been on the statute books a long time, giving preference to our coastwise vessels as against the vessels of other nations?

Mr. OWEN. I would take away such a monopoly from any set of men in this Republic.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator does not quite answer my question. Is the Senator in favor of repealing the law which protects our coastwise shipping from the shipping of other nations?

Mr. OWEN. I am.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is in favor of that. Is the Senator in favor also of repealing the ocean mail act of 1891, which gives a subvention to American ships carrying the mails?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I think there might arise a public necessity or a need to afford proper compensation to American ships in transmitting the mails and in establishing relations between this country and other countries. There is a possibility that might arise where a subvention would be justified, but I do not know of such a case. I would not say, however, that under no circumstances would I not consent to such a thing.

I will say, moreover, with regard to this particular agreement with Great Britain, that I think the United States would have a perfect right as far as the law is concerned to subsidize its own ships if it saw fit to do so. In demanding the repeal of the act of 1912 I am not willing to say, and I am not saying, that the United States has not the legal power to subsidize its own ships if it wants to, but I do not believe the people of the United States want to. I do not believe the people ought to want to. I think the plan of subsidy is fundamentally and morally wrong. This principle of privilege once adopted is always used as a lever to get more and more privilege and greater and greater advantages, which are not justified, out of the Public Treasury for private interests.

Mr. GALLINGER. What I particularly wanted the Senator's opinion on was the question whether he is prepared to repeal the law which has been on the statute books for a good many years——

Mr. OWEN. Oh, Mr. President, I am not passing on such questions now.

Mr. GALLINGER (continuing). Giving the preference to our coastwise ships, and thus permit the tramp steamers of every nation in the world to come and engage in our coastwise trade. The Senator said a moment ago that he was in favor of it, but now he says he is not.

Mr. OWEN. One thing at a time is sufficient. Mr. President, I should like to insert in the RECORD, without reading, the convention of Constantinople, signed October 28, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, which is referred to in article 3 of the treaty of 1901.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Translation.]

Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Empress of India; His Majesty the Emperor of Germany, King of Prussia; His Majesty the Emporer of Austria, King of Bohemia, etc., and Apostolic King of Hungary; His Majesty the King of Spain, and in his name the Queen Regent of the Kingdom; the President of the French Republic; His Majesty the King of Italy; His Majesty the King of the Netherlands, Grand Duke of Luxembourg, etc.; His Majesty the Emperor of All the Russias; and His Majesty the Emperor of the Ottomans, wishing to establish by a conventional act a definite system destined to guarantee at all times and for all the powers the free use of the Suez Maritime Canal, and thus to complete the system under which the navigation of this canal has been placed by the Firman of His Imperial Majesty the Sultan, dated the 22d of February, 1866 (2 Zilkadé, 1282), and sanctioning the concessions of His Highness the Khedive, have named as their plenipotentiaries, that is to say:

Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Empress of India, the Right Hon. Sir William Arthur White, her ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary;

His Majesty the Emperor of Germany, King of Prussia, M. Joseph de Radowitz, his ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary;

His Majesty the Emperor of Austria, King of Bohemia, etc., and Apostolic King of Hungary, M. Henri, Baron de Calice, his ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary;

His Majesty the King of Spain, and in his name the Queen Regent of the Kingdom, Don Miguel Florez y Garcia, his chargé d'affaires;

The President of the French Republic, M. Gustave Louis Lannes, Count de Montebello, ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary of France;

His Majesty the King of Italy, M. Albert, Baron Blanc, his ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary;

His Majesty the King of the Netherlands, Grand Duke of Luxembourg, etc., M. Gustave Keun, his chargé d'affaires;

His Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, M. Alexandre de Nélidow, his ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary;

His Majesty the Emperor of the Ottomans, Mehemmed Saïd Pasha, his minister for foreign affairs;

Who, having communicated to each other their respective full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE 1.

The Suez Maritime Canal shall always be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to every vessel of commerce or of war, without distinction of flag.

Consequently the high contracting parties agree not in any way to interfere with the free use of the canal in time of war as in time of peace.

The canal shall never be subjected to the exercise of the right of blockade.

ARTICLE 2.

The high contracting parties, recognizing that the fresh-water canal is indispensable to the maritime canal, take note of the engagements of his highness the Khedive toward the Universal Suez Canal Co. as regards the fresh-water canal, which engagements are stipulated in a convention bearing date the 18th March, 1863, containing an exposé and four articles.

They undertake not to interfere in any way with the security of that canal and its branches, the working of which shall not be exposed to any attempt at obstruction.

ARTICLE 3.

The high contracting parties likewise undertake to respect the plant, establishments, buildings, and works of the maritime canal and of the fresh-water canal.

ARTICLE 4.

The maritime canal remaining open in time of war as a free passage, even to the ships of war of belligerents, according to the terms of article 1 of the present treaty, the high contracting parties agree that no right of war, no act of hostility, nor any act having for its object to obstruct the free navigation of the canal shall be committed in the canal and its ports of access, as well as within a radius of 3 marine miles from those ports, even though the Ottoman Empire should be one of the belligerent powers.

Vessels of war of belligerents shall not revictual or take in stores in the canal and its ports of access, except in so far as may be strictly necessary. The transit of the aforesaid vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay, in accordance with the regulations in force, and without any other intermission than that resulting from the necessities of the service.

Their stay at Port Said and in the roadstead of Suez shall not exceed 24 hours, except in case of distress. In such case they shall be bound to leave as soon as possible. An interval of 24 hours shall always elapse between the sailing of a belligerent ship from one of the ports of access and the departure of a ship belonging to the hostile power.

ARTICLE 5.

In time of war belligerent powers shall not disembark nor embark within the canal and its ports of access either troops, munitions, or materials of war. But in case of an accidental hindrance in the canal, men may be embarked or disembarked at the ports of access by detachments not exceeding 1,000 men, with a corresponding amount of war material.

ARTICLE 6.

Prizes shall be subjected, in all respects, to the same rules as the vessels of war of belligerents.

ARTICLE 7.

The powers shall not keep any vessel of war in the waters of the canal (including Lake Timsah and the Bitter Lakes).

Nevertheless, they may station vessels of war in the ports of access of Port Said and Suez, the number of which shall not exceed two for each power.

This right shall not be exercised by belligerents.

ARTICLE 8.

The agents in Egypt of the signatory powers of the present treaty shall be charged to watch over its execution. In case of any event threatening the security or the free passage of the canal, they shall meet on the summons of three of their number under the presidency of their doyen, in order to proceed to the necessary verifications. They shall inform the Khedivial Government of the danger which they may have perceived, in order that that Government may take proper steps to insure the protection and the free use of the canal. Under any circumstances, they shall meet once a year to take note of the due execution of the treaty.

The last-mentioned meetings shall take place under the presidency of a special commissioner nominated for that purpose by the Imperial Ottoman Government. A commissioner of the Khedive may also take part in the meeting and may preside over it in case of the absence of the Ottoman commissioner.

They shall especially demand the suppression of any work or the dispersion of any assemblage on either bank of the canal, the object or effect of which might be to interfere with the liberty and the entire security of the navigation.

ARTICLE 9.

The Egyptian Government shall, within the limits of its powers resulting from the Firmans, and under the conditions provided for in the present treaty, take the necessary measures for insuring the execution of the said treaty.

In case the Egyptian Government should not have sufficient means at its disposal, it shall call upon the Imperial Ottoman Government, which shall take the necessary measures to respond to such appeal; shall give notice thereof to the signatory powers of the declaration of London of the 17th March, 1885; and shall, if necessary, concert with them on the subject.

The provisions of articles 4, 5, 7, and 8 shall not interfere with the measures which shall be taken in virtue of the present article.

ARTICLE 10.

Similarly, the provisions of articles 4, 5, 7, and 8 shall not interfere with the measures which His Majesty the Sultan and His Highness the Khedive, in the name of His Imperial Majesty, and within the limits of the Firmans granted, might find it necessary to take for securing by their own forces the defense of Egypt and the maintenance of public order.

In case His Imperial Majesty the Sultan or His Highness the Khedive should find it necessary to avail themselves of the exceptions for which this article provides, the signatory powers of the declaration of London shall be notified thereof by the Imperial Ottoman Government.

It is likewise understood that the provisions of the four articles aforesaid shall in no case occasion any obstacle to the measures which the Imperial Ottoman Government may think it necessary to take in order to insure by its own forces the defense of its other possessions situated on the eastern coast of the Red Sea.

ARTICLE 11.

The measures which shall be taken in the cases provided for by articles 9 and 10 of the present treaty shall not interfere with the free use of the canal. In the same cases the erection of permanent fortifications contrary to the provisions of article 8 is prohibited.

ARTICLE 12.

The high contracting parties, by application of the principle of equality as regards the free use of the canal, a principle which forms one of the bases of the present treaty, agree that none of them shall endeavor to obtain with respect to the canal territorial or commercial advantages or privileges in any international arrangements which may be concluded. Moreover, the rights of Turkey as the territorial power are reserved.

ARTICLE 13.

With the exception of the obligations expressly provided by the clauses of the present treaty, the sovereign rights of His Imperial Majesty the Sultan, and the rights and immunities of His Highness the Khedive, resulting from the Firmans, are in no way affected.

ARTICLE 14.

The high contracting parties agree that the engagements resulting from the present treaty shall not be limited by the duration of the acts of concession of the Universal Suez Canal Co.

ARTICLE 15.

The stipulations of the present treaty shall not interfere with the sanitary measures in force in Egypt.

ARTICLE 16.

The high contracting parties undertake to bring the present treaty to the knowledge of the States which have not signed it, inviting them to accede to it.

ARTICLE 17.

The present treaty shall be ratified, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Constantinople within the space of one month, or sooner if possible.

In faith of which the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present treaty, and have affixed to it the seal of their arms.

Done at Constantinople, the 29th day of the month of October, in the year 1888.

Mr. OWEN. I will not detain the Senate much longer.

Mr. President, the Hay-Pauncefote convention of 1901, in the preamble, declares the intention of the convention to be to provide for—

The construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States without impairing the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention.

And article 8—convention of 1850—declares the principle—

That the same canals or railways being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

The convention of November 18, 1901, in article 1, superseded the Clayton-Bulwer convention of 1850, and in article 2 authorized the United States to construct, regulate, and manage the proposed canal.

Article 3 adopted certain rules—

Substantially as embodied in the Convention of Constantinople, signed October 28, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal.

It will be observed that by the convention of Constantinople—see above—the canal is to be open to the ships of all nations on equal terms, except that Turkey and Egypt may protect their sovereignty rights, regardless of the rules of neutrality otherwise enforced.

This exception was not inserted in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of November 18, 1901, because we had not at that time acquired sovereignty over the land itself, but, anticipating that this might be done, article 4 of the treaty provided as follows:

It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutrality or of the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

When in 1903 the Republic of Panama entered into a treaty with the United States granting a strip of land 10 miles wide to the United States for the purpose of establishing the interoceanic canal, the sovereignty of the United States attached, with all the rights of sovereignty to defend its rights, regardless of the rules established by article 3, just as Turkey and Egypt, in the convention of Constantinople, were recognized as having such sovereign right.

But the convention of Constantinople meant equal rights as to tolls and no discrimination against any nation in the matter of conditions or charges of traffic.

Section 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty declares:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

It is contended that the term "free and open" to the vessels of all nations "observing these rules" does not mean to include the United States among the words "all nations," because the United States could not be expected to observe the rules 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, under article 3. It is true that the United States as the sovereign power would not be bound in the same way by these rules, but the United States in adopting these rules—in 1901—should observe them as modified by the duties of sovereignty—acquired in 1903—and should enforce them by virtue of sovereignty. Express attention, however, is called to the next line, which says:

that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects—

That is, all nations.

No discrimination by whom? Obviously no discrimination by the United States, the sovereign power, against any such nation or its citizens or subjects, in a limited way, to wit—in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise, such conditions and charges of traffic to be just and equitable.

When, therefore, the United States gives statutory exemption from tolls to the vessels of American citizens plying between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of the United States, a traffic estimated primarily at a million tons, and which will probably in some years reach 10,000,000 tons, such a statutory exemption might seriously affect the charges levied on the citizens of other nations and would not be equitable or just unless the full volume of such tolls was by law estimated in fixing the charges proportionately upon the traffic passing through the canal. The treaty rights of other nations should not be left merely to executive discretion, with an invitation of statute law to discriminate.

An act of Congress giving exemption from tolls without recognizing this principle of equitable apportionment may justly, therefore, be regarded as a statutory discrimination by the United States against the vessels of citizens of other nations.

It is not necessary to assume in demanding the repeal, upon the above considerations, that the United States would not have the right to grant any subsidies it might see fit to vessels owned by American citizens. Whether it does so or not is a question of domestic policy, with which other nations have no concern, unless the subsidy is granted in such a way as to eventuate in or effectuate a discrimination in the matter of the charges levied upon the vessels of the citizens of other nations.

In demanding the repeal of the tolls exemption, I yield nothing whatever of the sovereign rights of the United States over the canal, only insisting that the sovereignty shall be exercised with justice to all mankind and that the charges imposed under the sovereignty of the United States shall be, as the treaty provides, "just and equitable" and "without discrimination."

Mr. President, a divine light, the subjective knowledge of truth and justice, is lodged within the soul of every living man. In the exercise of sovereignty our public men should be guided by this light—by the law of righteousness voiced by the Great Teacher in the golden rule, "Do unto others as ye would have them to do unto you." This is the wise policy for nations and men. "Be noble and the nobility that lies in other men, sleeping, but never dead, will rise in majesty to meet your own" applies also to nations.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I desire to say, in order that there may be an expression in the RECORD in regard to this alleged monopoly in coastwise shipping, that it seems to me the term "monopoly," as used in that respect, is used improperly. There is no monopoly of the coastwise vessels of the United States, nor does the law give any institution or any individual a monopoly of the coastwise trade. It provides that only American vessels, built in American yards and manned by American seamen, shall engage in traffic between ports of the United States. That is all there is to it. There is no monopoly. The word "monopoly" can not be used in that connection except improperly, and the effect of it, of course, is to mislead the American public.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. OWEN. Of course the Senator knows, and I know, that the law, in terms, does not establish a monopoly. What the law does is to cut off foreign competition and permit those who have gotten control to arrange the ports and the prices at their will; and that does make, in effect, a monopoly.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator is mistaken as to its being a monopoly in effect. As he will understand upon reflection, the railroads have controlled or have obtained control of a large part of the coastwise traffic of the United States. I think the report that was recently made, and that has been commented upon very largely in the other body, shows that between 80 and 90 per cent, at least, of our coastwise traffic has been controlled by the railways. So railway domination of water traffic has become prevalent in many sections of the country. The Panama Canal act sought to break up that monopoly so as to give independent shipping an opportunity; and one of the agencies to give independent shipping an opportunity to break up the attempted monopolizing of that traffic was this very exemption clause which it is sought to repeal.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. FALL. Is it not a fact that if there is any railroad monopoly in the shipping from the east to the west coast it is the monopoly of the Tehuantepec Railroad, a British-owned enterprise, which carries 750,000 tons per annum of the coastwise trade of the United States?

Mr. BRISTOW. I think the Tehuantepec road, in its traffic agreements and arrangements with the American-Hawaiian Steamship Co., is a very potent factor, and by cooperation with the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., the majority of whose stock is owned by the Southern Pacific Railroad, they have worked together and have established an absolute monopoly of shipping via Panama and Tehuantepec.

Mr. FALL. And that railroad is owned under a 51-year partnership agreement by Mexico and Lord Cowdray, is it not, by which Lord Cowdray has the entire control of the road and all of its income?

Mr. BRISTOW. It is owned by the Mexicans, and it is operated under a partnership contract with the English firm of Pearson & Co., who, I understand——

Mr. FALL. Sir Weetman Pearson is Lord Cowdray.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; and I am inclined to think that Pearson & Co., in connection with the Canadian Pacific interests, are the principal parties at interest in this controversy.

Mr. FALL. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. BRISTOW. And they have been so fortunate as to obtain powerful influences in their behalf in the United States against American interests and American enterprise, against the patriotic purpose of the American people to control their own domestic affairs.

Mr. FALL. It is a fact, is it not, that under that contract Lord Cowdray's road in Mexico receives one-third of the tonnage from New York, for instance, to Hawaii at the rate of $4.07 gold per ton on all of our coastwise traffic, to the amount of 750,000 tons per annum?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; they have a percentage of the freight rate.

Mr. FALL. I will say that that is a fact; that i is one-third, and that it amounts to $4.07 gold per ton upon all our coastwise traffic, which in turn amounts to 750,000 tons per annum. I will also say that the contract between Lord Cowdray and the American-Hawaiian Steamship Co. is exclusive, and is only contingent to this effect: That the American-Hawaiian Steamship Co. can abrogate that contract upon the opening to traffic of the Panama Canal, and it has been stated in sworn evidence taken by the House committee that the opening of the Panama Canal free will destroy the Cowdray enterprise.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to state further, along the line suggested by the Senator from New Mexico, that I was advised personally by a responsible party representing Sir Weetman Pearson & Co. that under proper toll charges in passing ships through the Panama Canal the Tehuantepec Railroad would be able to compete with the Panama Canal. In that conversation my informant said that the tolls ought to be, from a business point of view, in order to justify the American Government's investment in Panama, about $2 per ton, and that if the tolls were imposed at that figure the Tehuantepec Railroad after the canal was open would be as profitable as before it was open. Yet we have here to-day the humiliating spectacle of the American Government becoming absolutely subservient to the financial interests of an English company that is running a railroad across the Tehuantepec Peninsula in Mexico, and we are sacrificing American interests and American sovereignty in the interest of this English concern, and doing so apparently upon the pretense that there is some national honor at stake.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I ask now that the unfinished business may be laid before the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from North Dakota will permit me, I wish to suggest to the Senator from Kansas a further important fact. That is, that if Great Britain carries out the same policy regarding the Panama Canal that she does regarding the Suez Canal, if we pay tolls on our shipping through the Panama Canal, Great Britain will remit from the treasury of the British Empire the tolls on British ships, and thus put us to a serious disadvantage unless we do the same thing, and the Senator from Oklahoma says the Democratic Party will never allow that to be done.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; and we shall find ourselves shut out of handling any traffic that England can handle.

Mr. GALLINGER. Absolutely.

Mr. BRISTOW. And we shall find every American ship driven from the seas and its place taken by an English or a German vessel.

Mr. McCUMBER obtained the floor.

Mr. GORE. Mr President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I merely wish to propound a question to the Senator from Kansas. According to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], the freight rate per ton on the Tehuantepec Railroad is $12.21. The tolls proposed on international shipping through the Panama Canal are $1.20 per registered ton, which would be about 60 cents per freight ton. Even upon that basis there would be a saving of $11.60 a ton. Does not the Senator think that might possibly contribute to the upbuilding of our interstate shipping, even in defiance of this British monopoly?

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me understand just what the Senator from Oklahoma said. I did not understand what he said as to the amount of charges made by the Tehuantepec Railroad.

Mr. GORE. According to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] the charge is $12.21 per ton.

Mr. BRISTOW. No; the Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Four dollars and a half.

Mr. BRISTOW. They move traffic very much cheaper than that. There is some traffic that goes through, I know, as low as $8 per ton from New York to the Pacific coast.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Four dollars and a half.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to say that one-third of the freight rate was $4.07 per ton. I was surprised at the statement.

Mr. BRISTOW. I think the Senator from Oklahoma is mistaken. It is one-third of the rate that goes to the Tehuantepec Railroad, whatever the rate may be.

Mr. GORE. That would be far more reasonable, but I understood the Senator from New Mexico to say that $4.07 was a third of the rate, making the aggregate $12.21. Even upon that basis, however, there would be a saving of $3.40 per ton in favor of free passage through the canal.

Mr. BRISTOW. Of course the Senator is entirely mistaken. The rates vary, of course, depending upon the commodities and their destination——

Mr. GORE. That is undoubtedly true, but I assumed the rate stated was the average.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is actual tons handled also, while the dollar and a quarter a ton is on the tonnage of the vessel.

Mr. GORE. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. And if the vessel is only half full, she pays then $2.50 a ton on the traffic that is carried through.

Mr. GORE. It is supposed to average about 60 cents a ton.

Mr. McCUMBER. I know how hard it is to let go the tolls question, but I now ask that the unfinished business may be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 120) to provide for the inspection and grading of grain entering into interstate commerce, and to secure uniformity in standards and classification of grain, and for other purposes.

Mr. STERLING obtained the floor.

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator from South Dakota will yield to me for just a moment, the bill (H. R. 6827) to amend an act entitled "An act to change the name of the Public Health and Marine Hospital Service to the Public Health Service, to increase the pay of officers of said service, and for other purposes," approved August 14, 1912, was passed by the Senate on Saturday, but there was an amendment to the bill which had been adopted by the committee. The clerk—my clerk, I expect—failed to put the amendment in the bill. I therefore ask unanimous consent for a reconsideration of the votes whereby the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed, in order that the amendment may be inserted in it.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move the amendment to section 4 of the bill that I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following:

SEC. 4. When any common carrier, officer, agent, or employee thereof shall willfully violate any of the rules and regulations made and promulgated as provided for in this act such common carrier, officer, agent, or employee shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500 or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will say in explanation that that is the penalty clause of the bill and it was left out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understood the Senator to say that the penalty clause of the bill had been inadvertently omitted and that this is it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This is it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is this a new bill or a new penalty in the old law?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; this is an amendment of a statute already upon the statute books.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Which contains a penalty clause now?

Mr. WILLIAMS. And which does not contain any penalty clause. The committee thought it proper to give it, because the Public Health Service have complained that they can not enforce it, there being no penalty. The statute upon the books now makes certain provisions and then provides that the Public Health Service may make other provisions, giving them the force of law, but there is no penalty clause in the present statute, and so they found themselves utterly unable to enforce the sanitary regulations.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. From what committee does the bill come?

Mr. WILLIAMS. From the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine. I will say that this was unanimously adopted by the committee.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Does the law as this completes it make the violation of a regulation of the department or bureau a crime or misdemeanor?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will read it to the Senator so that he may understand it:

That the officers of the Public Health Service may enter upon all the vessels, vehicles, trains, carriages, or conveyances of any and every kind and every description belonging to common carriers, while such carriers are engaged in interstate commerce, for the purpose of ascertaining whether they are kept by them in a sanitary condition. And the Secretary of the Treasury and the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission are authorized to make all such reasonable rules and regulations as may be necessary to secure the keeping of such vessels, vehicles, trains, carriages, or conveyances in a sanitary condition by such carriers while engaged in interstate commerce, and to request the Attorney General to cause to be instituted such legal proceedings in the district courts of the United States as may be necessary to compel the observance of such rules and regulations by said carriers.

There is no penalty attached.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is as I was afraid it was. This bill, I understand from the Senator's reading and the proposed amendment, puts it within the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to make certain regulations the violation of which shall constitute a crime.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; but the law prescribes the character of the regulations. They shall be for the purpose of keeping vessels, vehicles, and trains in sanitary condition.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It seems to me that is sailing very close to the danger line. I, for one, have always——

Mr. WILLIAMS. We have reconsidered the bill, and I will ask that it, together with the amendment, go to the calendar, and we can consider it more at leisure later.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is better.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will ask first that the amendment be incorporated upon the bill, and then that the whole matter go to the calendar. I move the amendment now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is in the Senate and the question is upon agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, I ask that the bill as amended go to the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi now asks that the bill as amended go to the calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

GRADING AND INSPECTION OF GRAIN.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 120) to provide for the inspection and grading of grain entering into interstate commerce, and to secure uniformity in standards and classification of grain, and for other purposes.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I am quite conscious of the fact that the question I propose to discuss for a little while is not the absorbing topic of the hour, as is that discussed so ably and so eloquently by several Senators to-day.

But, Mr. President, the question is an important and interesting one nevertheless, and, like the Panama Canal question, it is one that has something of a history.

The effort to secure the legislation contemplated by this bill has been a remarkable one and has a remarkable history, and to that history, and to something that has been said from time to time in the course of an effort to secure the proposed legislation, I wish first to call very brief attention.

In the Fifty-second Congress, in 1892, a bill was introduced by Mr. Sherman, of Ohio, providing for the national inspection of grain. In the course of the discussion upon that bill Senator Sherman used the following language:

The passage of this bill is, I believe, requested by nearly all the farmers' alliances in the United States, especially in the northern States where wheat and these cereals are grown. Hitherto the rules of classification have been determined by the various boards of trade. * * * I was about to say that not only have some of the State legislatures asked for this uniform rule, but the farmers' alliances have requested it. I have many letters about it.

In that same year the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Rusk, spoke and wrote concerning the desirability of legislation of this kind, and he said:

Another matter which is the subject of legislation now pending is that of a national standard of grain. There is evidence in the correspondence of this department of a steadily growing feeling in favor of the establishment of such a national standard which will relieve the grower from the annoyance inseparable from the existence of several standards, varying in the different grain markets of the country.

Unquestionably—

He says—

some system of national inspection and grading under the control of the Secretary of Agriculture should be established in the interest of the grain growers, and would be, without doubt, in a very short time accepted and recognized in all the great market centers of the United States.

Subsequent to 1892, when Senator Sherman spoke in favor of national inspection, and when the Secretary of Agriculture wrote as he did in favor of such inspection, several bills were introduced in Congress prior to 1902. In 1902 the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], who has already made such an able, exhaustive, and thorough argument in support of the pending bill, introduced a bill substantially the same as the one we are now discussing. As a part of our history, I wish to call attention to an extract from the message of the President of the United States in this connection to the Sixtieth Congress, wherein he refers to the desirability of legislation of this kind. The President said:

The grain-producing industry of the country, one of the most important in the United States, deserves special consideration at the hands of the Congress. Our grain is sold almost exclusively by grades. To secure satisfactory results in our home markets and to facilitate our trade abroad, these grades should approximate the highest degree of uniformity and certainty. The present diverse methods of inspection and grading throughout the country under different laws and boards result in confusion and lack of uniformity, destroying that confidence which is necessary for healthful trade. Complaints against the present methods have continued for years, and they are growing in volume and intensity not only in this country but abroad. I therefore suggest to the Congress the advisability of a national system of inspection and grading of grain entering into interstate and foreign commerce as a remedy for the present evils.

Mr. President, it is now 22 years since the agitation began in regard to Federal grain inspection and since the first bill was introduced in that behalf, and still there is no legislation.

The grain business has grown immensely since 1892. The production of grain has increased since that time, and as a consequence of the increased production the business in interstate grain trade has increased with it. If there was a necessity or a demand for it back in 1892 there is a greater necessity and a greater demand for it now than then.

I wish, briefly, Mr. President, to advert to the importance of the grain trade. I can not do that very well without referring to the production, and I take the single year of 1910 to show something of the vastness of the grain business.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is discussing a most important question affecting the area of more than two-thirds of the United States, a question of intense interest, and it is proper that he should have these seats filled and not empty. I therefore suggest the want of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota raises the question of no quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brady	Kenyon	Overman	Swanson
Brandegee	Kern	Owen	Thomas
Bristow	Lee, Md.	Page	Thompson
Bryan	Lewis	Pittman	Thornton
Burton	Lippitt	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Chamberlain	Lodge	Shafroth	Walsh
Clark, Wyo.	McCumber	Sheppard	Weeks
Crawford	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga.	Williams
Fall	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Md.	Works
Hitchcock	Nelson	Smoot
Hollis	Norris	Sterling
Jones	Oliver	Sutherland

Mr. PAGE. I was requested to announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] are absent upon official business of the Senate.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SHERMAN], who was called away from the Chamber by public business.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If there is no quorum, so far, I suggest that the list of absentees be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. POMERENE answered to his name when called.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to state that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] are absent from the Senate on official business.

Mr. GORE, Mr. ROBINSON, and Mr. ASHURST entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators having answered to the roll call, there is a quorum present.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, the production of the more important cereals for the single year 1910, together with the receipts of those cereals at just four of the terminals named in the bill, will give some idea of the business involved, the value of that business to the country, and the importance of its proper regulation by some method that will do as nearly equal and exact justice to all concerned as can be done.

The corn produced in this country in 1910 was 2,886,260,000 bushels. Its value was $1,384,817,000.

The wheat produced that year was 635,121,000 bushels (it was nearly 100,000,000 more in 1912), with a value of $561,051,000. The oats produced in 1910 were 1,186,341,000 bushels, with a value of $408,174,000.

In 1912 we produced 1,418,337,000 bushels of oats, with a value of $452,463,000. In 1910 the barley produced was 173,832,000 bushels, with a value of $100,426,000. Of this grain there was produced in 1912, 223,824,000 bushels, with a value of $112,957,000.

The total value of these four cereals alone for the year 1910 was the enormous sum of $2,454,042,000.

Reckoning on a basis of a population of 90,000,000, that is more than $27 per capita.

Besides these grains, there was the flax crop, valued, in round numbers, at thirty-nine millions, twenty-nine millions, and thirty-five millions, respectively, for the three years 1909, 1910, and 1911.

These figures are taken from the statistical abstract.

Taking just four of the terminals named in the bill—Minneapolis, Chicago, Duluth, and Kansas City—I have here the figures from the report of the Minneapolis Chamber of Commerce for the year 1910, showing the receipts, in bushels, for wheat, corn, oats, barley, and flaxseed at these several cities during that year. I will not take the time to read it, but will ask that the table which I have here be printed as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that will be done.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, the figures show the great proportion of these cereals which go into interstate trade and transportation. Here in these figures which fairly stagger us we see in addition to the greatness of our agricultural resources something of the magnitude of the interstate traffic in grain. It is a trade which involves the agricultural products of many different localities—products upon which all our people more or less depend wherever they live or whatever their occupation.

It is obviously a trade which has afforded the temptation and opportunity for gambling and manipulation; a trade in which the opportunity has been taken advantage of, and this is not "obviously" merely, but historically true as everybody knows; a trade in which there have been, according to all the evidence, many abuses and discriminations resulting in injustice to both the producers and final purchasers of grain. But, leaving out of account every element of fraud or of intentional wrongdoing, it is a trade in which certain essential and inseparable features are subjected to different rules and systems in different jurisdictions. The result is a want of uniformity in the method of determining the thing that is of the essence of the trade, and that is the quality. The quality varies, and that greatly. It is affected by the seasons, by climatic conditions, by methods of cultivation. But quality is ascertained on inspection and quality so ascertained determines price. The quality is designated, not determined, by grades, and the grain at these terminals is brought and sold by grade. But, Mr. President, grain is not graded differently for different purposes; at least there is no need that it should be. But all grain of each kind of grain is graded as though it were to be used for one purpose, as all wheat for flour out of which to make bread; all corn for meal; all oats for feed; all barley for malt; and hence the same standard of grading for the several grains will apply to Boston as to San Francisco, to New Orleans as to Duluth. If it is grade No. 1, according to the test and standard fixed at one place, it should be grade No. 1 everywhere else. If it is No. 3, or goes rejected at one place, it should be of the same grade everywhere else. Local conditions of supply and demand might affect the price in a particular locality, but barring these and the element of transportation cost the price throughout the country should for a given grade of grain be practically the same.

It is plain, then, that the great desideratum is a law which will give uniformity in grades, uniformity in grades of grain in course of or intended for interstate shipment.

We seek this uniformity exactly on the same principle that for years we have sought to secure uniformity in State legislation on a variety of subjects which do not affect interstate commerce and with which Congress has no power to deal, but which do affect interstate relations, or, more properly, the relations of citizens of different States.

Thus, various associations and congresses have been seeking for many years to bring about uniformity in legislation relating to marriage and divorce. The American Bar Association has been for many years in cooperation with bankers and business men endeavoring to secure the enactment of a uniform negotiable-instrument law, and the effort is not proving altogether without avail; and so there are many other subjects where, out of diversity and conflict of laws, uncertainties exist as to the rights and liabilities of citizens of different jurisdictions. Out of the uncertainty arises litigation and loss. Hence the demand for uniformity, in order, for example, that the rights and liabilities of drawer, indorser, or acceptor of one jurisdiction may be known to the holder of the obligation anywhere. To make all such laws uniform is the demand, and in regard to some subjects it is also the tendency. The great merit in a code of laws is the certainty of the law in its application to all citizens whose transactions bring them within its purview. The ancient Romans complained, not of a lack of law but of not being able to know what the law was—of the uncertainty of the law—hence the Twelve Tables, in order that every man might know the law.

Uniformity in the law is the one sure prerequisite to certainty in the law.

In regard to the subject under consideration, we are not compelled to do the one vain thing of attempting to secure uniform State laws. Congress has the power, and can take the short cut, and give uniformity at once.

I can not be charged with particular zeal in wishing to extend the powers of the General Government or any department thereof to the management or supervision of affairs or business within a State and which should be left to State supervision. On the contrary, I believe my utterances on another occasion show that I am a firm believer in the self-reliance of the people of a State, and that our best development as a Nation comes from a high regard for the pride, the independence, the initiative of the State. But, Mr. President, this is not a State affair. It long ago became national; it is, in fact, international; it involves foreign commerce; and the extension of trade, the building up of trade centers, and the rapid transit of the present day give new emphasis to the conclusion that this phase of the grain business is the proper subject of national regulation. I may be mistaken, but as the question now appeals to me our duty is obvious. If the evils arising from these various laws and systems in regard to grading and inspecting grain were one-twentieth part of what they are said to be and in fact are, we would be justified if we did, and inexcusable, quite, if we did not, pass a law which would prevent them.

Want of uniformity may not be an absolutely necessary incident to the present system of inspecting and grading grain, but it has existed ever since dealers began to inspect and grade; it exists now; and there is no concerted movement among the States or those interested in boards of trade or chambers of commerce that I know of to bring about the enactment of uniform State laws upon the subject. If there is such a movement, it must be new—in its incipiency; and, judging by the experiences of the past in other matters to which I have referred, we know what a long and tedious process it would be, first, to procure an understanding among the several States as to just what methods would be best adapted to securing uniformity; and, secondly, to have the understanding enacted into law. It is not probable that it ever would be done.

So, Mr. President, without other consideration at all; without here charging that the dealers in grain have willfully and wrongfully manipulated grades for the purpose of depressing or increasing the price of wheat or other grains, or that public warehousemen have been guilty of violating the law in the buying and selling of wheat, and that they have changed grades in order that they might profit by that operation also, but laying aside all such charges, I contend that the magnitude of the business, the interstate trade in grains, the lack of uniformity in grading, and the impossibility of securing such uniformity in any other way—these things alone make a case for the bill; and the wonder is that under the conditions its passage has been so long deferred.

The producers of grain and the public generally demand no more than is fair. But they demand what is fair. The grain growers can not hope for any undue advantage; they can not hope to get something for nothing or more than a fair equivalent for the grain they have to sell, because its quality and grade are determined under tests prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, such tests to be applied by men under his direction. They must necessarily be impartial; but it is this impartiality of men who are neither interested in the business nor subject to the influences that emanate from boards of trade or big elevator concerns that appeals to the producer and begets in him the demand for Federal inspection.

Why is his demand resisted? The only answer there can be to that question is that impartial, disinterested, uniform inspection the country over will operate to the disadvantage of some special interests.

I do not use the term "special interests" in any particularly opprobrious sense, but, Mr. President, nobody will believe that the representatives of boards of trade or chambers of commerce oppose this bill in the capacity of guardians of the interests of the producers of grain. They are not in the business for the opportunity it gives them to be philanthropic; they oppose this bill in the interests of "good business" for the elevator companies, for the board of trade men, for the speculators in grain. We may as well be frank and say that they are here for the revenue that accrues to them from maintaining the present system. Their pecuniary interests are at stake—this from a business and not necessarily an illegitimate business standpoint.

But, Mr. President, if, on the other hand, we are to believe what has been said by credible witnesses, there is a fear on the part of these interests that under Federal inspection the opportunity for questionable practices will be taken away; that all chance for "plugging" cars, all chances for strict inspection or liberal inspection at will, all chances for great profits out of either lowering or raising grades will have "gone glimmering," and that with some of them their occupations will be gone.

The Senior Senator from North Dakota has reviewed at length the evidence showing these practices, and I will not repeat it.

Mr. President, we have heard something about the proverbial "nigger in the woodpile," and I have sometimes wondered whether there may not be one here, and whether the great and persistent opposition to Federal inspection from this one source is not to some extent based upon the fear that Federal inspection, though not intended for that purpose, would lead to the disclosure of other evils existing in grain markets and on boards of trade and who, for safety's sake, would avoid full publicity.

I do not know that this is so, but the advantages of uniform grading of grain seem to be conceded on all hands. An honest, impartial, uniform inspection and grading will injure no legitimate grain business; and when we find this opposition to what is so obviously just and beneficial to the general public we can not ecsape the conclusion that the private gains derived from the present system and methods are the basis for the opposition.

That these interests can not be relied upon to safeguard the interests of the public is very well shown by a quotation or two from the opinion of the court in a case against the public warehousemen of Chicago brought by the State of Illinois to restrain them in the use of their public warehouses, to keep them within the limitations of the law, and to prevent resulting public injury. I quote briefly from the decision. The court says:

> The evidence shows that defendants, as public warehousemen storing grain in their own warehouses, are enabled to and do overbid legitimate grain dealers by exacting from them the established rate for storage, while they give up part of the storage charges when they buy or sell for themselves. By this practice of buying and selling through their own elevators the position of equality between them and the public whom they are bound to serve is destroyed, and by the advantage of their position they are enabled to crush out, and have nearly crushed out, competition in the largest grain market of the world. The result is that the warehousemen own three-fourths of all the grain stored in the public warehouses of Chicago, and upon some of the railroads the only buyers of grain are the warehousemen on that line. The grades established for different qualities of grain are such that the grain is not exactly of the same quality in each grade, and the difference in market price in different qualities of the same grade varies from 2 cents per bushel in the better grades to 15 cents in the lower grades. The great bulk of grain is brought by rail and in carloads, and is inspected on the tracks, and the duty of the warehousemen is to mix the carloads of grain as they come. Such indiscriminate mixing gives an average quality of grain to all holders of warehouse receipts. Where the warehouseman is a buyer the manipulation of the grain may result in personal advantage to him. Not ony is this so, but the warehouse proprietors often overbid other dealers as much as a quarter of a cent a bushel and immediately resell the same to a private buyer at a quarter of a cent less than they paid, exacting storage which more than balances their loss. In this way they use their business as warehousemen to drive out competition with them as buyers. It would be idle to expect a warehouseman to perform his duty to the public as an impartial holder of the grain of the different proprietors if he is permitted to occupy a position where his self-interest is at variance with his duty. In exercising the public employment for which he is licensed he can not be permitted to use the advantage of his position to crush out competition and to combine in establishing a monopoly by which a great accumulation of grain is in the hands of the warehousemen, liable to be suddenly thrown upon the market whenever they, as speculators, see profit in such course. The defendants are large dealers in futures on the Chicago Board of Trade, and together hold an enormous supply of grain ready to aid their opportunities as speculators. The warehouseman issues his own warehouse receipt to himself. As public warehouseman he gives a receipt to himself as individual, and is enabled to use his own receipts for the purpose of trade and to build up a monopoly and destroy competition. That this course of dealing is inconsistent with the full and impartial performance of his duty to the public seems clear.

The defendants answer that the practice had a beneficial effect upon producers and shippers, and naturally were able to prove that when, by reason of their advantages, they were overbidding other dealers there was benefit to sellers, but there was an entire failure to show that in the general average there was any public good to producers or shippers.

Mr. NORRIS. What is that from?

Mr. STERLING. That is from a decision of the Supreme Court of Illinois.

Now, these were public warehousemen, privileged under the law to own and operate their warehouses for the receiving and storing of grain and prohibited under the law of the State of Illinois from engaging in the business of buying and selling grain, because that private business of their own would be in conflict with the duty they owed to the public. But these men, all keen, shrewd business men, skilled in knowledge of grain and the trade, were not only ready to take advantage of the public, but they were ready to use the position of trust confided in them by the law, and to violate the law for their own individual gain.

I have not read all the evidence given at the committee hearings, but much that I have is in support of what the court finds to be the facts in that decision.

That decision itself makes a case for this bill; it brings together that which may be gleaned from many pages of testimony given by many witnesses. If you say that simply depicts conditions at one terminal and relates only to one class of warehousemen, I answer that those very conditions affect the producers of grain in the two Dakotas, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, and Illinois, and other States, the value of which runs into the many hundreds of millions of bushels every year; and if Chicago was the only terminal worth while, since the trade is so largely interstate, there ought to be the impartial Federal activity in the matter that would prevent the use of interstate commerce to the injury of the public; and that is what it amounts to, for here is the right to engage in interstate commerce, to use it for all legitimate ends—even to the building up of fortunes in that alone; but here, too, is the plenary power of Congress to regulate and control it, and it is the business of Congress to so control it that no one can use it in so direct a way to the detriment of the public.

In the case from which I have quoted the warehouse people, in addition to the claim that shippers and producers were benefited by these practices, answered that it was a general custom for such warehouses to deal in grain, but the court found there was no such custom.

They answered further that the warehouse commissioners permitted the practices complained of. The court held that if this were true it could not amount to a construction of the statute which would govern. If the commissioners were derelict in their duty and failed to apply to the Attorney General to institute a suit, it would not bind the public.

And this reminds me that the railroad and warehouse commissioners of other States may have been either derelict in their duty or obsessed with the idea, as was Mr. Staples, of the warehouse commission of the State of Minnesota, that the State system of inspection as carried on at the great terminals in that State was perfection itself. It could not well be anything else, because the commission was perfect, "without shadow of doubt or turning," and of course would appoint no one else but a perfect chief inspector, and he in turn none but perfect deputy inspectors, the whole aggregation being proof, of course, against all local influences and against all temptations to strengthen and build up the business of their own centers of trade to the prejudice of others, which they could do, of course, by building up business men and conniving at practices which would give them an advantage over their rivals.

As bearing out what has been said in regard to the evils resulting from different systems of inspecting and grading grain, the fraud and injustice likely to arise therefrom, even when the inspection is made under a State system of inspection, I wish to call attention to the case of Globe Elevator Co. against Andrew, decided by United States circuit court, Federal Reporter, volume 144, page 871. This was a case brought primarily or essentially for the purpose of having the Wisconsin State law declared unconstitutional as an attempt to regulate interstate commerce. I want to call attention to a few extracts from the decision:

Chapter 19, page 37, Laws of 1905, creates a corporation known as the Superior Grain & Warehouse Commission and provides for the regulation of public warehouses. Its chief purpose is to create a system of Wisconsin inspection and fully enforce the same through strict penal provisions, and incidentally prevent the sale of grain by the fraudulent Minnesota system. This purpose is sought to be accomplished: First, by carefully drawn provisions governing the inspection and weighing of grain milled, bought, or sold in Superior or stored or shipped from Superior elevators or warehouses; second, by exhaustive and thorough regulation of the grain-warehouse business in Superior; and, third, by provisions making the sale, purchase, or delivery of grain under the Minnesota inspection system difficult if not impossible. The intent of the law seems to be to destroy the Minnesota system, because it is fraudulent, and to substitute therefor the Wisconsin system.

Then, the court, after discussing the question as to whether or not the States are invested with authority in regard to inspection laws, and when laws passed under the guise of inspection laws may be a regulation of interstate commerce, goes on to say:

Under these precedents it seems clear that the Wisconsin Legislature might lawfully prevent fraudulent changes of grades, arbitrary or fraudulent "dockage" practiced by warehousemen, and shipping out at a higher grade than that on which the grain was taken in. Such regulations would be in aid and furtherance of commerce by protecting the rights of both buyer and seller. Thus, many objections to the Minnesota system and frauds practiced under it might be cured. Such regulations, although indirectly affecting interstate commerce, would be wholly local in their character and would undoubtedly be sustained. Such regulations might even include inspection and weighing for the purpose of detecting and punishing fraud, preventing changes of grades, fraudulent "dockage," storage, and resale on the weights found before such dockage occurred, etc. All this would be local regulation to protect the public from fraud and imposition, and as such would not be unlawful regulation of interstate commerce.

Further on the court says—and I wish to call particular attention to one statement made by the court in this short paragraph:

However justified or necessary these emphatic provisions may have seemed to the Wisconsin Legislature, in order to destroy what appears from the evidence to be a fraudulent system, upheld by the combination of great interests, including buyer, seller, warehouseman, and carrier, they undoubtedly not only operate as a serious obstruction to commerce, as now carried on, under what should be one uniform system, but there is also disclosed a commercial conflict of considerable proportions between two States.

In that paragraph the court recognizes both the fact and the remedy. It recognizes the fact that the evidence shows that there was a fraudulent and wrongful inspection under the Minnesota system, and suggests that the remedy is one uniform system for the inspection and grading of grain.

Just a word in conclusion as to what was before the court or what the court found:

What has been said in this opinion—

The court says—

respecting changes of weight, dockage, and arbitrary changes of grades is borne out by the record as presented on these motions, nor was there upon the argument any substantial denial of the facts charged.

Mr. President, there can be no question as to the constitutional or legal aspects of the case. Interstate commerce in grain, vast as we all know it is, is a subject for Federal regulation, just as the inspection of meats intended for interstate commerce is the subject of Federal regulation, just as the inspection of foods intended for interstate commerce is a subject for Federal regulation, just as the inspection of live stock shipped from one State to another is a subject of Federal regulation. All such work of inspection, if intrastate, would fall under the police power of the State, but Congress, under the power conferred by the interstate-commerce clause, applies the same principle and guards the public health and public morals and protects the citizen from wrong and fraud.

I think the author if this bill need not be discouraged. The agitation for a pure-food law went on for 18 or 20 years—bills were pending in Congress for nearly that length of time—before the pure-food law of 1906 was enacted. It is said that the representatives of the manufacturers of adulterated foods and of patent medicines thronged the lobbies here as they had not done in years to prevent the enactment of a law designed to protect the health of men, women, and children all over this broad land, but a dilatory Congress at last woke up to the fact that the people were impatient of the delay and demanded the pure-food law, and Congress passed it. This bill, Mr. President, Senate bill 120, will be passed, I think, or a bill like it, and that before quite 20 years from the first introduction of the bill, although substantially the same bill was introduced by the Senator from North Dakota back in 1902.

Mr. President, any great body of the people may be wrong in judgment for a little while; they may unjustly suspect for a time that particular interests are not giving them a square deal; they may be mistaken as to the remedy and may fail to see that there are constitutional limitations or fail to see the wisdom of such limitations as they do perceive, but errors of this kind do not abide. They are not persisted in for 20 years, a dozen years, or 4 years. The sober second thought of the people themselves corrects the errors. If this were not so, we would despair of republican government.

And so with that great body of citizens engaged in the production of grain that finds its way into interstate commerce; they have not been making a mistake or laboring under a delusion for the past 12 years in their belief that great abuses and injustice are connected with the present system of grain inspection and grading. They have not been erring all this time in the belief that the Federal Government can and ought to afford relief.

From the testimony of some of the witnesses before the House and Senate committees, and indeed from the position taken here by some Senators, one might be led to infer that we would in the enactment of this legislation deprive somebody of a fundamental right. But who, and of what right?

The State can not complain because in lieu of State inspectors Congress says Federal inspectors shall inspect the grain coming through the channels of interstate commerce and finding its way to or on through the grain-shipping terminals of a State.

It is well settled that while a State in the absence of legislation by Congress may enact and enforce its own inspection laws which may incidentally affect interstate commerce, yet a State nor its citizens may complain if Congress sees fit to enact laws which enacted shall supersede all State laws on the subject. In the ever-expanding and increasing subjects of interstate commerce, in order to relieve against the uncertainties arising from State action, Congress has again and again interfered in the interests of commerce and for the general good.

Who will now assert that there has been a usurpation of power or that the general welfare has not been subserved by such action on the part of Congress?

No individual is deprived of any constitutional right in the enactment of such legislation. Your State grain inspectors—this comparatively small body of individual citizens who do the work of inspection under State laws or under board of trade rules has as against the General Government or the public no vested rights of which they will be deprived, and there will be no taking of property without due process of law. They are in the business of grain inspection subject to the wholesome power given by the Constitution to Congress to regulate commerce, and there need be no compunction in feeling that they or some of them are temporarily out of a job, or that they are required to have the Federal instead of a State Government for taskmaster.

Centralization ought not be a bogie to frighten us after the pure-food law, the meat-inspection law, the cattle-inspection law, and numerous other laws extending the power of some department of the General Government. After voting for some of the legislation enacted here, a man has little right to speak of anything being too paternalistic for him. Especially should he not say that of the measure now in hand.

But, Mr. President, none of the acts which I have mentioned are of greater public interest or concern more the public welfare than this proposed act for the Federal inspection and grading of grain. The producer of grain on the farm, the purchaser in the market, the ultimate consumer of grain or the product of grain, the citizen at home, as well as those abroad to whom we ship our surplus grain are interested in this legislation, and will welcome the uniformity, the honesty of dealing, the saving which will come from intrusting this great, important, and appropriate power to the Federal Government.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 27 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 31, 1914, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate March 30, 1914.

PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY.

MEDICAL CORPS.

To be captains, with rank from March 20, 1914, after three years' service.

First Lieut. Henry C. Michie, jr., Medical Corps.
First Lieut. Lauren S. Eckels, Medical Corps.
First Lieut. Albert P. Clark, Medical Corps.
First Lieut. Charles E. McBrayer, Medical Corps.
First Lieut. Eugene C. Nothington, Medical Corps.
First Lieut. Harley J. Hallett, Medical Corps.
First Lieut. Sanford W. French, Medical Corps.
First Lieut. Thomas J. Flynn, Medical Corps.
First Lieut. George E. Pariseau, Medical Corps.
First Lieut. Daniel F. Maguire, Medical Corps.
First Lieut. Edward C. Register, Medical Corps.
First Lieut. John M. Willis, Medical Corps.
First Lieut. Joseph L. Siner, Medical Corps.
First Lieut. William Denton, Medical Corps.
First Lieut. Joseph O. Walkup, Medical Corps.
First Lieut. John J. Reddy, Medical Corps.
First Lieut. Herbert H. Sharpe, Medical Corps.
First Lieut. Lloyd A. Kefauver, Medical Corps.
First Lieut. William T. Cade, jr., Medical Corps.
First Lieut. John R. McKnight, Medical Corps.

PROMOTIONS IN THE NAVY.

Asst. Paymaster Patrick T. M. Lathrop to be a passed assistant paymaster in the Navy from the 22d day of August, 1912.

Second Lieut. Charles G. Sinclair to be a first lieutenant in the Marine Corps from the 2d day of January, 1914.

POSTMASTERS.

CALIFORNIA.

W. H. Comstock to be postmaster at Folsom City, Cal., in place of Richard J. Murphy. Incumbent's commission expired January 26, 1914.

Rosalia A. Crandall to be postmaster at Etna Mills, Cal., in place of Marcus J. Isaacs. Incumbent's commission expired February 25, 1914.

Clarence M. Burnett to be postmaster at Tulare, Cal., in place of John A. Rollins, resigned.

S. H. Hawkins to be postmaster at Ione, Cal., in place of James F. Scott. Incumbent's commission expired March 17, 1914.

I. W. Hays to be postmaster at Grass Valley, Cal., in place of James C. Tyrrell. Incumbent's commission expires April 5, 1914.

Cleon Kyte to be postmaster at Arroyo Grande, Cal., in place of George P. Ide. Incumbent's commission expired January 26, 1914.

T. M. Storke to be postmaster at Santa Barbara, Cal., in place of Daniel F. Hunt. Incumbent's commission expires May 18, 1914.

CONNECTICUT.

Robert T. Bradley to be postmaster at Newtown, Conn., in place of Wilson M. Reynolds. Incumbent's commission expired January 17, 1914.

COLORADO.

Edward H. Kruchten to be postmaster at Flagler, Colo. Office became presidential January 1, 1914.

IDAHO.

Peter M. Davis to be postmaster at Boise, Idaho, in place of John McMillan. Incumbent's commission expired February 18, 1914.

Edna West Keyes to be postmaster at Challis, Idaho. Office became presidential January 1, 1914.

ILLINOIS.

Frank Howey to be postmaster at Albion, Ill., in place of Harry Bower. Incumbent's commission expired December 21, 1913.

J. E. Longenbaugh to be postmaster at Moweaqua, Ill., in place of John Clark. Incumbent's commission expires April 25, 1914.

Torrence B. McGovern to be postmaster at Oneida, Ill., in place of Leonard M. Nash. Incumbent's commission expired December 21, 1913.

Charles W. Shade to be postmaster at Lexington, Ill., in place of William Stickler. Incumbent's commission expired March 17, 1914.

INDIANA.

Charles Roy Morris to be postmaster at Salem, Ind., in place of Samuel P. Morris. Incumbent's commission expires April 28, 1914.

Gordon N. Murray to be postmaster at Nappanee, Ind., in place of William Miller. Incumbent's commission expired January 20, 1914.

Clinton Rogers to be postmaster at Markle, Ind., in place of D. C. Bickard. Incumbent's commission expired March 18, 1914.

William A. Service to be postmaster at Greenfield, Ind., in place of Willard S. Pugh, deceased.

Frank E. Watson to be postmaster at Corydon, Ind., in place of Thomas S. Jones. Incumbent's commission expired March 7, 1914.

IOWA.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 30, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. James S. Montgomery, pastor Metropolitan Memorial Methodist Church, of Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou art our heavenly Father, and we are Thy children. Help us, that we may ever esteem Thee to be the source of every good and perfect gift of life. We thank Thee, O God, for the Commandments, which were given a long time ago, which are perfect in their character and perpetual in their obligations. We thank Thee for the Sermon on the Mount, which is the divinest expression of man's duty to his fellow man that ever fell from Thy holy lips. Lead us, this day, in the pathways of truth and wisdom. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, March 28, 1914, was read and approved.

ORDER IN THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER. Before debate begins, the Chair again asks all gentlemen who are in the House during debate to be seated and to keep their seats, or, if they desire to converse, to leave the floor. The Chair also wishes to admonish the occupants of the gallery that they are here by the courtesy of the House, and they must not talk enough to disturb the proceedings, and they are absolutely prohibited from applauding. If there is violation of these rules, the Chair will have the galleries cleared.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the special order, which is further consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone.

At this time I desire to have inserted in the RECORD the majority report of the committee, and also two short editorials upon this matter.

The report of the committee and the editorials referred to are as follows:

[House of Representatives Report No. 362, Sixty-third Congress, second session.]

SECTION 5 OF AN ACT TO PROVIDE FOR THE OPENING, MAINTENANCE, PROTECTION, AND OPERATION OF THE PANAMA CANAL, ETC.

Mr. ADAMSON, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, submitted the following report to accompany H. R. 14385:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass.

In reporting the canal bill during the last Congress your committee recommended uniform tolls. By an amendment vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States were exempted and discretion was left in the President when levying tolls, based on net registered tonnage, on vessels of commerce of the United States and its citizens to fix them lower than on other vessels of commerce. The amendment also made possible a discrimination by fixing the minimum tolls on other vessels, based on net registered tonnage, at the cost of operation, while in levying tolls based on other forms of tonnage the minimum was fixed at the equivalent of 75 cents per net registered ton. The purpose of this bill is to repeal the exemption of vessels engaged in coastwise trade and to amend the other language so as to remove the possibility of discrimination in order to promote equality at the canal.

In the former report, made long before any foreign Government voiced an opinion or complaint, we recognized that treaty stipulations required uniform tolls, though we did not base our action solely on that ground, but emphasized the wise policy of fair treatment to our own people and the propriety of permitting our Government to collect the expense of operating the canal from the commerce using it rather than to remit part of the tolls, allow a portion of the commerce to pass through free, and make the deficit up by taxing our people and paying it out of the Treasury. We still recognize those reasons as sound, but deem it proper now to consider the international situation and our obligations and policy in relation thereto. True, there has as yet been no friction nor even strained relations with foreign Governments, but we are advised that the opposite party to the principal treaty under which the canal was constructed fails to approve our action in providing for exemption or to concur in our construction of the treaty. Other maritime countries hold the same dissenting opinion, and in the whole family of nations we stand alone in our contention. In such a situation it is not always necessary or wise to urge our contention, even though fully convinced of our abstract right. It is sometimes advisable in the interest of prosperity and good will to omit something which we may have undoubted right to do, but which is not actually required by specific duty. We are not disturbed by the taunt made for a purpose, that repeal would be truckling and yielding to foreign demands. A similar taunt could be hurled against any man or nation honorable enough to comply with contracts or generous enough to promote friendly relations by according respectful consideration to views of the opposite party.

From high sources in this and other countries and from men yet alive who participated in the formation of the various treaties, men whose veracity and integrity can not be questioned, come unequivocal statements that the language of the treaty controlling the imposition of tolls was not intended to permit such discrimination. Even if it were a close question with the balance tending in our favor, we could not afford, in a matter of national honor, to contend or even debate, especially a proposition which involves a policy not in the interest of our entire people but in the interest of a small special class in whose favor the exemption operates against the general interest of the entire people. The ethics and propriety of declining to occupy debatable ground on such a question, involving our performance of treaty obligations, become more conspicuous when we consider our disinclination to refer to arbitration such a question to be passed upon by a tribunal made up in the greater part of representatives of governments all of whom hold opinions on the question antagonistic to our position. Virtue and honor, personal or national, are not debatable nor subject to arbitration. Mere question of either destroys reputation and standing.

Ordinarily the language of the first section of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty would be plain and conclusive in favor of uniform tolls. There could be no clearer English than that used in the first sentence of the agreement in the third section by the master minds of the two leading English-speaking people of the world.

"The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise.

But advocates of exemption offer various arguments to break the force of the meaning of that English. The first of these is the favorite phrase composed of catchwords, "The canal is ours," "We built it," "and we have a right to do as we please with it."

"If we can not do as we please with it what profit can we derive from it?" These words are not only catchy, but are also indefinite, misleading, and true only in so far as consistent with our contracts. Inappropriate and indefinite use of the pronouns "we" and "our" seem to confuse the minds of the thoughtless, probably designed for that purpose. It is important to ascertain and bear in mind the meaning of the words "we" and "our" in determining rights, duties, and profits. The Government of the United States, a corporation, technically contradistinct from the people and commerce of the United States, built the canal under treaties. The profit to be derived from it may be first and primarily the convenience and advantage in transit and mobilization of the Army and Navy, the only constitutional warrant for its construction by the Government. Second, the revenue which our Government hopes to secure from the incidental use of the canal by the commerce of the world. The first may prove ample compensation for the cost of construction, and it is hoped that patronage by commerce will defray the expense of operating the canal, and the government and sanitation of the zone. "We" the people direct "our" Government, and it may tax us to make up the deficiencies in revenue. The chief benefit that we the people derive from the canal is in shortening time and distance and lessening the cost of transportation between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of our country. No argument is necessary to demonstrate that in that respect we are benefited more than any and all the other people of the world.

The coastwise trade is operated by ships, 24,765 in number, enrolled and licensed for the coasting trade in contradistinction to the registry of those ships engaged in the foreign trade. Ten per cent of them are suitable for traffic through the canal, more than ample to carry its traffic.

While the corporate Government of the United States "shall 'under the second article of the treaty' have and enjoy all the rights incident to the construction as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal," there are other words in that article which those endeavoring to sustain the discrimination usually omit in quoting the article.

It is expressly conditioned that the rights of the Government of the United States are "subject to the provisions of the present treaty."

What are the provisions of the present treaty? The preamble states that the object of the treaty is "to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th of April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States," but adds "without impairing the 'general principle' of neutralization established in article 8 of the convention."

If the English language means anything, that means that whatever in substance section 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty provided as to the general principle of neutralization and equality was retained and made a part of the new Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

That being true, it is necessary to inquire what is section 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. It declares the intention of the two Governments "not only to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle."

They agreed to extend their "protection of treaty stipulations to any other practicable communications (the Clayton-Bulwer treaty referred to a canal at Nicaragua), whether by canal or railway across the Isthmus, and especially to the interoceanic communications, whether by canal or railway, now proposed by way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their general protection to any such canals or railways as by this article specified it is always understood that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable, and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State, etc."

SECRETARY OLNEY CONSTRUES.

Secretary of State Olney in 1896, in a memorandum on the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, said (Moore, 3 Dig. Int. Law, p. 207):

"As article 8 expressly declares, the contracting parties by the convention desired not only to accomplish a particular object, but to establish a general principle. This general principle is manifested by the provisions of the first seven articles, and is that the interoceanic routes thereby specified should, under the sovereignty of the States traversed by them, be neutral and free to all nations alike."

It is objected that as section 1, article 3, refers to vessels of war as well as of commerce, that the plain writing upon which we insist would require the United States to pay tolls on its war vessels. We think sound English interpretation will hardly sustain that contention.

Subject to the provisions of this new treaty, the United States Government "shall enjoy all the rights incident to such construction as well as the regulation and management of the canal." Under the new treaty we released all foreign Governments from the obligation to participate in protecting neutrality.

As owner it would be folly for the Government to take money out of the Treasury and pay it back into the Treasury for its war vessels. Its own vessels, not the vessels of its citizens, but the vessels of the United States Government as a corporation, may pass as incident to the construction and regulation and management. It may be necessary to use war vessels as well as fortifications to police the canal and maintain its neutrality under the obligation of the new treaty; but vessels of commerce are not the property of the corporation of the United States which built and operates the canal. They are the property of the citizens or subjects of the United States, and the Government of the United States as such is prohibited by that section from discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects, which would be done if citizens or subjects of this or any country were required to pay for the same services which are furnished to the citizens or subjects of any other country gratis. The corporate governmental entity, the United States, must treat alike vessels of citizens and subjects of all countries, including our own. Other nations not being owners of the canal must alike pay equal tolls on their war vessels. Panama, however, paid her tolls for all time in her contribution to the enterprise. There is no objection registered to the Panama deal nor the treatment of the war vessels of the United States Government.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty forbade the construction by either Government. When it was negotiated England desired an isthmian canal as much as we did. Not only did she desire a shorter route to the western coast of the three Americas, the Far East, and the Pacific Isles, but her local possessions on this continent and adjacent thereto being very similar to ours in position and extent she was also interested locally in a canal across the Isthmus.

This Government did not care to enter upon the construction of a canal, and she was unwilling for England to do so, even if she had so desired. Neither Government was willing that the other should acquire a foothold or extend its influence in Central America through the construction of the canal, and that was carefully guarded.

It was provided that the nations of the world should unite in protecting neutrality, and for that reason it should not be fortified. Equality of treatment at the canal was insisted on by us as much as by England. In fact, we initiated the demand for it, and in all our diplomacy regarding isthmian transit and border waterways from the days of Henry Clay down we have insisted on absolute equality, with two exceptions only, hereafter referred to, both exceptions being based on good, specific reasons.

Meanwhile the Suez Canal had been constructed by a private corporation under a French charter through a concession from the Khedive of Egypt. British financial operations and British diplomacy secured the stock held by the Khedive of Egypt. While not constituting a majority of the stock, it enabled England, by the cooperation of other friendly stockholders, to make satisfactory arrangements for the use of that canal by her commerce. Therefore the necessity for reaching the Far East with her foreign trade had been met to her satisfaction, and to that extent her necessity for an isthmian canal had been reduced. Nevertheless she was still willing that it should be constructed if the commerce of Canada and her possessions in Central and South America and the West Indies could enjoy equal advantages through the canal, and the commerce of the whole world could receive at the canal exactly equal treatment as to charges and conditions.

So the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was modified and resolved into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which made few substantial changes. It was agreed for the Government of the United States to construct a canal at her own expense as the owner and controller thereof, subject to the other conditions of the treaty. The prohibition against fortification was abrogated, and the United States was expressly authorized to police and protect the canal, relieving the other nations of the world from participation in protecting neutrality and assuming that burden herself.

The other condition, retained and ratified in the same substance in a little different language but equally strong, provided for absolute equality in treatment at the canal "as to conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise," which subtracts 8,000 miles from the sailing distance between our Atlantic and Pacific ports, by guaranteeing the benefit to all vessels alike and on equal terms.

The advocates of exemption claim that language similar to the equality provision in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty has been construed away by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Olsen v. Smith, 195, page 344, which decision they claim holds this exemption not to be a discrimination under the language of the treaty. An examination of that case, however, and the treaty which it construes will negative that contention. It is true in that opinion they held that the language used in the second paragraph of the second section of article 2 of the treaty of 1815, to wit, "no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States," is not violated by an exemption of vessels in the coastwise trade from pilotage charges in an American port, and they say that the "exemptions do not constitute a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade. * * * In substance the proposition but asserts that because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempted from pilotage regulations. Therefore, there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even though such regulations apply without discrimination to all vessels engaged in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign."

The treaty of 1815 proposes expressly "to regulate the commerce and navigation between their respective countries, territories, and people" (Great Britain and the United States), and in three articles covers all the commercial relations between these countries, their territories, and people.

The first and second articles relate to freedom of commerce and navigation in reciprocal trade between all the territories of the United States and all the territories of Great Britain in Europe only, admitting "their ships and cargoes to all such places, ports and rivers in the territories aforesaid" with "complete protection and security," but "subject always to the laws and the statutes of the two countries, respectively."

So that not only is the entire idea of coastwise trade excluded from consideration by physical and geographical conditions, but in the last paragraph of the second article it is provided that the commerce of the continent of North America and the West Indies "shall not be affected by any provision of this article, but each party shall remain in complete possession of its rights with respect to such intercourse."

In the third article, in which certain rights are granted to foreign ships to touch at certain points in a country, express agreement is made that the arrangement will not extend to the coasting trade.

So, in view of the terms of the treaty expressly excluding local commerce of the continent of America and the West Indies from consideration and also making all the foreign commerce subject to the laws of the country, there is no wonder that the Supreme Court held the statute in question not to be a violation of the treaty. There is no analogy or resemblance between the two cases. In that case alleged discrimination was a pilotage regulation in an American port, not prohibited by treaty at all, but expressly provided in the treaty to be governed by the local law, unaffected by the treaty.

On the other hand, the treaty language touching tolls at the Panama Canal limits our consideration to treatment at the canal, an international waterway, built by authority of three treaties with foreign nations through a foreign country. By no interpretation or intendment can that meaning be stretched to permit consideration of the local conditions in the various countries of the world in order to make the canal an administrator to even up and equalize these conditions by considering them, to determine whether or not in the general balancing of accounts particular people or vessels which traverse the canal have profited or lost in their transactions.

The language is clear and positive that at the canal there shall be "entire equality in respect to the condition or charges of traffic or otherwise," not that all other conditions elsewhere shall be taken into account in order that they may be evened up at the canal, but the "canal shall be free and open" on such terms, which means, if it means anything, that all the vessels of the same character and tonnage shall be charged the same rate, and that all accommodations or supplies and treatment furnished to any of them shall be furnished to all others who desire them upon exactly the same terms, regardless of their ownership or nationality.

Into that same error people have fallen who insist that because local American waterways are free to the world the canal ought to be free to the coastwise trade—an utterly illogical conclusion. It proves too much. If it were an American waterway, and the same policy were pursued, all vessels of all nations would go through free; we could collect no revenue and the canal would be an entire charge on the Treasury instead of only about half, as would result from the exemption; but the fact remains that in 1846, under the treaty with Colombia, which, although badly mutilated, is still in force, the United States contracted with Colombia that "the right of way or transit across the Isthmus upon any modes of communication that now exist or that may be hereafter constructed shall be open and free to the Government and citizens of the United States, etc.

"That no other tolls or charges shall be levied or collected upon the citizens of the United States or their said merchandise passing over any road or canal that may be made by the Government of New Granada than is under like circumstances levied upon and collected from the Granadian citizens."

In consideration of these grants the United States guarantees positively and efficaciously to New Granada the perfect neutrality of the before-mentioned Isthmus, with the view that the free transit from the one to the other sea may not be interrupted or embarrassed in any future time, and also guarantees the rights of sovereignty and property which New Granada has over the said territory.

Afterwards, and before the canal was constructed, the United States in a treaty with Panama, which had seceded from Colombia, notwithstanding our guaranty of both territory and sovereignty, we repeated the same obligations as to equality of treatment which we had assumed in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty with Great Britain. So, instead of being an American waterway to be open as a gratuity to the world in conformity to our local policy as to rivers and harbors, the Panama Canal is by three binding treaties an international waterway, to be operated under the terms of these treaties with equal treatment to the people and subjects of all nations, it being in a foreign country and constructed by the consent of other nations under binding covenants that run with the enterprise.

Where a government or people of a country bordering on different oceans connect opposite coasts by any means of transportation they make a domestic line, as in the case of our transcontinental railroads or the railroads traversing any country bordering on two oceans like the Tehuantepec Railroad, or any canal doing the same, such as the Kiel Canal, or the Corinthian Canal, or the great canal just being finished in Canada connecting the Georgian Lake through the French and Ottawa Rivers with the St. Lawrence at Montreal, which in the future will probably accommodate more commerce than both the Panama and the Suez Canals combined, and which our Lake States and cities will probably desire to use.

The Suez Canal, however, built by private capital and a private corporation in a foreign country under a concession, and the Panama Canal built by the Government of the United States in a foreign country under contracts with foreign Governments, are international waterways to be operated according to the treaties made for the purpose, and there is no escape from it.

For illustration, under the treaty with Colombia and the Clayton-Bulwer treaty a New York corporation built the Panama Railroad, which has been operated more than half a century, and although our coastwise ships often broke bulk and transshipped freight over that road, as did the ships of other nations, yet no demand was ever made for discrimination in the charges and practices over that road, although it was governed under contract in those treaties by the same principles of equality as apply to the Panama and Suez Canals. In fact, such was the consecration of our Government to its plighted faith in our sacred and inviolable policy of neutrality and equality on the Isthmus that distracted Colombia was forbidden even to threaten interference with Isthmian traffic far enough to coerce seceding Panama back into the fold.

In the entire history of our isthmian and transcontinental diplomacy we insisted on absolute equality. We have made many treaties touching such transit. All the border waterways between us and Canada are used under treaties, some of which are revocable by express terms and liable to be revoked to the detriment of our commerce unless we act fairly.

CONSTRUCTION FORCED BY UNITED STATES.

It is fortunate that this exact question has been determined by the forced construction and contention of the United States itself concerning a treaty, also with Great Britain, relative to the canals and channels of the Great Lakes, in which the political departments of our Government, executive and legislative, contended successfully against the strenuous objection of Canada and Great Britain. The United States insisted that the words "on terms of equality" did include both coastwise and foreign commerce, trade, and navigation, exactly as the majority of your committee has reported. Canada and Great Britain insisted, to the contrary, that the words "equality of treatment" did not include coastwise and domestic trade, commerce, and traffic, exactly the position of the minority of your committee. This contention continued through several years, covered larger interests probably than would be affected by the provision as to the Panama Canal for many years in the future, was participated in by two Presidents and three Secretaries of State and both Houses of Congress, was finally won by our Government and admitted by Great Britain, that the words "on terms of equality" did include coastwise as well as foreign commerce, and that coastwise trade could not by implication be excepted from such language in any treaty by the nation which desired it. Our legislative acts declaring and insisting upon such construction are now on our statute books, are in force and ready for business if Great Britain should again refuse to agree to our construction of such language with reference to the use of the canals about the Great Lakes.

The only exception from our record of equality is the treaty with Mexico, which built the Tehuantepec Railroad with its own capital and credit, through its own territory, with both terminals on its own coast. No other nation was consulted about it nor contributed to its construction nor had any rights in it, and when Mexico made a treaty with us for the use of it she reserved a preference to her own people, and she has exercised that privilege under the treaty because reserved for valid reasons.

There was a treaty made with Nicaragua in 1884, but never ratified, in which for apparent reasons Nicaragua reserved the right to discriminate in favor of her own citizens. There was also omitted from that treaty the provision for neutralization, which was entirely consistent, for neutralization and discrimination can not possibly coexist.

An effort was made when the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was ratified to amend that in the Senate by reserving the right to discriminate, but it was overwhelmingly defeated. An ineffectual attempt has been made to discredit the plain record in that case, remembered by a great many men still living, by vague and indefinite assertions that the proposition was voted down, because recognized as unnecessary under the language of the treaty. The English language of the transaction being so clear and explicit, so many of the participants in the negotiation and formation of that treaty failing to reconcile their memories to that contention, it will have to fail and the record will stand that the United States Senate on a yea-and-nay vote expressly refused to reserve the right to exempt the coastwise trade from tolls.

The following five paragraphs in the note of Secretary Hay transmitting the draft of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to the Senate put the Senate on notice of the contents and intent of the treaty and negative absolutely and forever these contentions:

"(6) The general principle of neutrality was reaffirmed, preserved, and secured against any change of sovereignty of Panama.

"(7) The President takes the position that the United States built the canal at its sole cost for the equal benefit of all nations.

"(8) The general principle of neutralization and equality has always been insisted upon by the United States, and it has recognized in this way the justice of the request of Great Britain on condition that she surrendered important national and material interests in the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. So that this general principle and its application to the sovereignty of Panama should be maintained.

"(9) These rules (based on neutralization and equality) are adopted in the treaty with Great Britain as a consideration for getting rid of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

"(10) Upon the consideration and at the same time to put all powers on the same footing, by complying with the rules of neutrality, this section 1, article 3, was framed and adopted."

The fact is that in all our treaties, which are very numerous, providing for amity, commerce, and navigation, wherever the coastwise trade is not expressly exempted from the stipulations of a treaty there is no distinction, that in construing the language of treaties any stipulation will be construed to apply to all commerce, domestic and foreign, unless expressly excepted.

As already shown heretofore, all of our treaties with other nations touching international waterways, such as border waterways and isthmian canals and railroads, there is no express distinction made between domestic and foreign commerce, except in the instances already mentioned, made for good reasons, but one of them never ratified.

But it is insisted that the United States has now acquired controlling sovereignty over the zone in which the canal is situated, and therefore that language in the treaty is nullified. Those making that assertion are reminded that the far-seeing statesmen and English scholars who drew the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, as if anticipating a change in territory and sovereignty, and fearing the very contention now insisted upon, forestalled the claim and protected equality and neutrality at the canal by providing in the fourth section of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty "that no change of territorial sovereignty, or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the aforementioned canal, shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligations of the high contracting parties under the present treaty," so that whatever degree of sovereignty the United States has acquired makes no change in the contractual relations as to treatment of those who use the canal. Though built by the United States Government with the money of the United States Government, operated and regulated by the United States Government, it is held by our Government under a covenant running with the enterprise which we can not disregard without violating our international faith.

It appears to your committee that after almost a century of agitation and negotiation the United States Government having under international agreements with three powers in behalf of themselves and the balance of the world been permitted to construct the canal on its own account on conditions clearly and unequivocally stated and agreed to, we are compelled in honor, without waiting for friction and embarrassment, or even the suggestion of other nations, to comply with our agreements or stand discredited among the nations as unwilling to perform our treaty obligations. We can so comply with less reluctance in this case when we consider that the persons in whose behalf this discrimination is intended to operate do not really need that assistance; that they are the most highly protected class in the world, having no competition, and that all they requested of your committee was that they should continue to enjoy protection against foreign competition in the domestic trade.

We are also assured that no benefit accrues to shippers, localities or the people from this exemption, but that it goes to the benefit of the coastwise ships and nobody else.

A misleading argument has been made that there is a fight between these coastwise ships and the transcontinental railroads, and that the exemption is necessary to enable the ships to compete with the railroads through the canal. The truth is, many of the good ships in the coastwise trade are owned by the railroads. The railroads did not hope to compete with the canal by carrying freight on their tracks, but they expected to marshal their instrumentalities, use their railroad-owned ships to drive competing ships off of the canal as they have done elsewhere, then raise freight rates on the canal to the level of railroad rates, and thus combine and monopolize all the transportation across the continent.

Your committee promptly arranged to prevent that threatened evil by the eleventh section of the canal act, which promises to be worth more to the American people commercially than the canal itself will ever be worth, by forbidding the railroads subject to the act to regulate commerce to own or control or hold any interest in ships which compete, or should compete, with themselves.

Your committee did not fall into the error of trying to exclude railroad-owned ships at the canal, because that would have violated the treaty as much as the exemption of coastwise ships from tolls. We adopted a method entirely consistent with the treaty, which, while preventing ships owned by railroads subject to the act to regulate commerce from going through the canal, will not be a canal regulation, but a regulation of commerce—to exclude such ships from all our own waters, including transit through the canal—and instead of violating the treaty by endeavoring to exclude ships at the canal, will control the railroad-owned ships through the railroads owning them under the provisions of law which give to the Interstate Commerce Commission authority to enforce their orders.

If we had followed the suggestion of those who dispute the provision for equality, we would have fallen into the error of trying to exclude the railroad ships at the canal and enacted a provision in violation of the treaty.

The opponents of repeal object, presumably by way of demurrer, that England's protest is instigated by the Canadian Pacific Railroad. To whatever extent the Canadian railroads operate in our interstate commerce, thereby subjecting themselves that far to regulation under the act to regulate commerce, the Interstate Commerce Commission controls their conduct, and, under the amendment of the act, carried in section 11 of the canal act, may also control their ownership or interest in any vessel which competes with or ought to compete with so much of the service or operation as is performed by such railroad in our interstate commerce. All Canadian ships, railroad owned and otherwise, being foreign vessels, are excluded from our coastwise trade by our navigation laws. If they ply between their home ports or between any of their ports and any of our ports, through the Panama Canal or otherwise, they are engaged in foreign commerce so far as we are concerned and can not possibly compete with any railroad engaged in the interstate commerce of our country. If Canadian ships can compete with any railroads, they must be railroads in Canada, which we can not reach at all except in so far as they engage in our interstate commerce. It is not apparent how with or without a canal we can compel foreign ships of a foreign country to compete with the railroads in their own country for the business of their own country. We have no interest in the matter. If we insist otherwise, we can not wonder if Canada does instigate England. It being natural for a child to cry to its mother for relief, and Canada being a dependency of the British Empire, it is not surprising if Canada appeals to the mother country for protection respecting a contract entered into by the mother country. Even selfish interests should allow us to appear rational when discussing a self-evident truth fully visible to everybody else.

Our railroad-owned ships having been excluded from competition in our waters and the water route having been shortened 8,000 miles, freight rates between Atlantic and Pacific ports should be reduced far below the possibility of railroad competition on their own tracks unless the steamboat companies decline to compete with one another through the canal, in which case rates will be arbitrary, being placed just enough below the railroad rates to command the business, or unless there should be fierce competition between rival lines to cut freight rates very low, in both of which events the payment of tolls by the coastwise ships would be entirely immaterial to the shipper or consumer.

The charge of $1.20 a net ton, which on an average would be about 50 cents a freight ton, or about 2½ cents per 100 pounds, would make very little difference in cost, even if the shipper or consumer were given the benefit of it, but if 2½ cents per 100 pounds is material and tolls collected of only half of the ships that pass furnish a given amount of revenue, suppose that instead we collect uniform tolls of all the ships; then 60 cents per net ton, or 25 cents per freight ton, or 1¼ cents per 100 pounds, would produce the same amount, and the tolls would hurt nobody.

It ought to console those who must give up the fond theory of toll exemption that it is better for all the people to bear half the burden of tolls than for a privileged class to be given half of the entire revenue as a largess, while all the public make up the deficit in the Treasury by paying double tolls.

But it is insisted that unless we subsidize our ships we can never build up a merchant marine, in which we are so sadly deficient, and will never have ships enough to do the business through the canal. It appeared on the hearings that there were several companies each of which owns and operates sufficient ships already, and with ability and readiness to construct more, to carry all the coastwise trade between the two oceans for years to come, and it further appeared from the statement of distinguished managers of those companies that they would not compete with one another through that canal, that it would be good business policy for those lines which did the business through the canal to be left in control of that traffic, while other lines would continue to use their ships profitably elsewhere.

Giving that discrimination to the coastwise trade, however, does not help the portion of the American merchant marine which needs building up. Our people already have the best fleet of coastwise ships in the world, and our coastwise business, both in number and tonnage, compares favorably with the ships and tonnage of any other country, even with the business done by Great Britain in the home trade of the United Kingdom, including not only the home trade of the United Kingdom, but also the trade between the United Kingdom and the Continent of Europe from the mouth of the river Elbe to Brest.

Our largess is wasted on the coastwise trade, which is so prosperous that it is considered an inviting field for new enterprises based on the exemption and on the general policy of partition and exclusion without express agreement as to combination and division, already referred to.

The portion of our merchant marine that needs strengthening is that portion which is struggling to build up trade with foreign nations. Giving benefits to the coastwise ships does not carry our sails to the foreign ports of the world and exchange business with all nations.

Under the exemption of the coastwise trade our most cruel and inexcusable discrimination is against our own people in the foreign trade. Under exemption of tolls one-half of the lockages would be performed as a gratuity and the other half be expected to supply what revenue might be realized.

As it is probable that the coastwise ships will require about half of the lockages for the first five or six years, and it is estimated that $5,000,000 will be required to pay expenses, not claiming anything for interest on the cost of construction, it is estimated that the half from the ships paying tolls at $1.20 per net ton would be about $2,500,000 per annum, and the United States Treasury would have to pay out of the people's money the other $2,500,000 to pay for locking through the canal the vessels of the special interests.

Two vessels leave the Atlantic port at once, each measuring or estimated at 5,000 tons. One is bound for a Pacific port, heavily laden at remunerative freight rates, and certain of a return cargo, exempt from foreign competition, and through courtesy exempted from domestic competition. The other ship is bound for a foreign port without any aid or protection, in competition with the ships of all the nations of the world in every port it may visit. It goes lightly loaded to hunt for business, under threatened exclusion by rings, pools, and combines, and with little hope of a profitable return cargo. That ship is our representative abroad, our hope of recognition, and our standard of respectability and commercial character. The two ships tie up at the guide wall at Gatun. The first, prosperous, protected, and independent, is carried through at the expense of the Treasury, which means our people, absolutely free. The other is handicapped in its weakness and adversity by a charge of $6,000 to cheer it on its way in its quest of business and in its effort to uphold abroad the character and dignity of our commerce.

Let those who becloud the issue by seeking to arouse prejudice against England think about their treatment of their own fellow citizens, and let those who really desire the upbuilding and the prosperity of the merchant marine direct their efforts to strengthening and extending our foreign trade, and whatever may be done let it be as a direct, independent proposition, thereby sparing the great canal enterprise, the greatest ever undertaken successfully by mortal man or government, the handicap and embarrassment of being hampered by exemptions, exceptions, and restrictions that impair its operation and threaten its success. Allow the Government which through the conception of its statesmen and diplomats and the genius of its able and immortal engineers, has constructed this great work, to open it on fair terms and correct principles, to demonstrate that it can be made a financial success as well as a physical, diplomatic, and engineering triumph.

Even under fair conditions there is no reason to hope that the commerce using the canal for the first few years, though paying uniform tolls, will at the rate fixed contribute more than the amount necessary to pay the expense of operation, government, and sanitation. Those familiar with the situation will be happy and surprised if that much is realized. If this exemption is allowed, that alone would take away half of the revenues and the other half would be greatly reduced from the fact that the capitalists of the various nations of Europe, being interested both in the Suez Canal and in the foreign shipping, would, conditions of distance and accommodations being equal, prefer their own canal to ours.

There would remain for the Panama Canal but little of the world's traffic outside of our own foreign and domestic trade. We have nothing to gain by a policy of discrimination of any character or direction. We are prepared to prosper under fair treatment and equal conditions. World-wide competition and exact equality would swell the sails of our vessels and speed them with the gales of prosperity into all the ports of the world, to return to us laden with wealth from commerce with all nations.

The foreign Governments objecting to our construction of the treaty can find a hundred points in the world's commerce to retaliate and discriminate, where we may blunder into using one. Our resources, genius, and geographical position equip us to defy the world to outstrip us on fair and equal terms. As a Nation we can not afford to rest under the imputation, whether just or unjust, of disregarding our plighted honor, nor should we hold a debatable position far enough to arouse friction, resentment, or retaliation. We can afford to leave other nations to take care of themselves and their own interests. We hold no brief for them, but our deep concern is with the fortunes of our own people and our national character. It is folly to refuse to do right because a foreign nation, party to a treaty, complains that our course is wrong. It is not necessary for us to yield to the dictation of anybody. We ought to be just and honorable enough to decide for ourselves what is right and act wisely on the dictates of our own consciences and judgment. It is no surrender to anybody to do so. No foreign Government has as yet even threatened us with any kind of war, either actual, commercial, or diplomatic. So there is no embarrassment or humiliation in our choosing the manly and upright course of deciding for ourselves what is right under the treaty as well as what policy is just to our own people and proceeding to act accordingly. We might in any kind of a contest with other nations win by sheer strength and skill, and in winning we might save all except honor. With honor gone, however rich, powerful, and detestable among the nations we might become, international respect and confidence will have been destroyed, humanity will have suffered a universal blow, and stable constitutional government will have fallen far back toward the dark ages of national infidelity, imbecility, corruption, oppression, and chaos. Far better to abolish the canal itself than even to permit our national honor to remain in question. No one certainly wishes that our glorious history should be marred by questionable conduct, much less could we for a moment consider the proposition of forfeiting or prostituting our powerful position and influence as the leader of civilization and good government by setting a pernicious example to other nations and posterity by a selfish and useless policy of injustice both to our own people and the other nations of the world.

THE HOUSE SUPPORTS PRESIDENT WILSON.

At the conclusion of a battle that bids fair to be historic in the history of the Democratic Party and the Nation, the House of Representatives has indorsed President Wilson's stand on the Panama Canal tolls issue by a decisive majority. That is the effect of the test vote in the House upon the resolution to bring to an early vote the Sims bill, which looks to repeal of the clause which exempts coastwise shipping from tolls. The advocates of prompt action are also advocates of repeal. The decisive majority by which the House agreed to hold debate within reasonable boundaries foreshadows its favorable action upon the repealing legislation.

The victory thus far is a signal victory for President Wilson, who had aligned against him most of the leaders of the party in the House. These Members found their convictions compelled them to differ with the President. They are due credit for speaking and voting according to their consciences. But the verdict of the House, registered by a nonpartisan majority, expresses the sentiment of the American people.

Two propositions are involved in the tolls controversy:

(1) The honor of the Nation. We are bound by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to accord to "all nations" similar treatment in the matter of tolls. Those favoring the exemption of American coastwise shipping declared that the phrase "all nations" does not include the United States. The preliminary vote in the House means that the House views this contention as a quibble.

(2) The question of a subsidy to coastwise shipping. The Democratic Party is committed against a subsidy principle. The tolls exemption would be equivalent to subsidizing coastwise shipping. More than that, coastwise shipping is already protected against foreign competition. If there is to be any shipping subsidy it should go to American shipping that must meet world-wide competition upon the high seas. To-day a vessel in the merchant marine sailing from, say, Savannah to a foreign port, with cotton or any other cargo, must compete on equal terms with the vessels of all countries. In going through the Panama Canal it would pay tolls as the vessels of all other nations. But an American vessel sailing from Savannah to San Francisco, or any other American port, is protected against foreign competition, since a foreign bottom can not secure United States registry in the coastwise trade. This coastwise vessel, if exempted from canal tolls, would go through the canal not only enjoying the advantage of monopoly on coastwise trade over foreign vessels, but it would reap the additional advantage of free passage through the canal.

The test vote shows that the administration will be indorsed in its straightforward stand for honor and justice.

The President and the House are alike to be congratulated on performing so plain a duty of patriotism.

[From the Atlanta Journal, March 25, 1914.]

THE "WHYS" AND "HOWS" OF THE CANAL TOLLS QUESTION.

"In connection with your editorial of the 18th, 'Why Subsidize a Monopoly?' I would like to ask a few whys and hows."

So writes a Journal reader, taking issue with our stand on the Panama tolls exemption. The editorial referred to contended that exemption of coastwise shipping from payment of canal tolls would be nothing short of Government patronage to a special interest, and would amount to subsidizing a monopoly at the expense of the public. "How can any man or company," asks our correspondent, "have a monopoly of seagoing craft?" The essential point is that United States vessels have an absolute monopoly of coastwise trade, no foreign ships being permitted to engage in such commerce. Certainly, therefore, they need no protection against foreign shipping interests, for they have no competition from that quarter. Whether they compete among themselves, or are controlled by a great, inclusive trust, we need not now inquire. The important fact is that in their sphere of transportation they move unrivaled and supreme.

That being the case, why should they be exempt from contributing their due share of the cost of the canal's upkeep? We are now considering the question entirely from an American point of view, as though there were no treaty obligations to be respected. Conceding for the moment that the United States has the right to let coastwise vessels use the canal without charge, we insist that it would be unwise, from a standpoint of our own country's economic interests, to let them do so. It would be just as reasonable and fair to let them use the mails without charge, or to exempt them from the income tax. They will profit by the canal tremendously, their business will expand and their earnings increase, they will continue the sole masters of water traffic between two or more American ports. Is it, then, anything but fair that they should pay their part toward the maintenance of the great interoceanic highway which was built largely for their benefit with the money of American taxpayers?

If the ships using the canal do not pay the cost of its operation and upkeep, the Government will have to pay it. Whatever deficit there is must come out of the National Treasury; that is to say, in the final analysis, out of the pockets of the people. It is conservatively reckoned that free tolls would cost $20,000,000 during the next 10 years. Would it be just to tax the American public for this amount merely in order that coastwise vessels might be given a special advantage which they in no wise need? Our correspondent speaks of President Wilson's effort to secure a repeal of the exemption clause in the canal act as "surrendering a national privilege." Far from that, the repeal of this clause would simply be canceling a special privilege and establishing equal rights.

A bill proposing to give the owners of coastwise vessels a million dollars a year would be laughed out of Congress as absurd. Yet that is the inner and essential purpose of tolls exemption. In effect, it is nothing less than a subsidy. All the wild babble we hear of "truckling to British demands" and the right of the United States to manage its own affairs is intended solely to confuse the issue and to red herring the trial of a shipping monopoly. Of course the United States has a right to regulate its own affairs, but it is going to regulate them in the interest of its people as a whole, not merely in the interest of a group of shipowners; and it is significant, indeed, that the only persons alarmed over the repeal of the exemption clause are dollar patriots in search of a subsidy or habitual jingoes who are morally irresponsible.

The Democratic Party is traditionally opposed to subsidies. That is why a majority of the Democrats of the House voted against the provision of the canal act which exempts coastwise shipping from payment of tolls when the bill was before Congress in 1912. Two-thirds of the Republicans of the House voted in favor of exemption, and it was their support that put the measure through. It would be as consistent for the Democratic Party to establish a high protective tariff as to stand for Government patronage to coastwise shipping interests. It is as much the duty of the Democratic Party to repeal that act of special privilege as it was to reduce the exorbitant schedules of the Payne-Aldrich tariff. In its economic aspect, the canal-tolls question is simply an issue between those who seek special privileges for particular interests and those who insist upon equal rights for the common country.

But there is another and a larger side to this question. By the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the United States pledged itself that the canal should be open to the commerce of all nations on terms of entire equality in respect to traffic charges. Our correspondent asks, "Why was such a promise ever made?" The all-important fact is that it was made. Honorable men do not quibble over contracts, nor do honorable nations.

The fact is, however, that the United States guaranteed this right to Great Britain and to other powers in return for the surrender of certain broad privileges which Great Britain held under a previous treaty. In 1850 England and the United States both concluded that they needed a canal to facilitate commerce between the eastern and western coasts of America. It was agreed, accordingly, that the two nations should assume a joint protectorate over an insthmian canal to be built through private enterprise. Then followed the adoption of a treaty known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which specified that "neither country should ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the ship canal, that neither country should ever erect or maintain any fortification in the vicinity of the canal," and that both countries should guarantee the "neutrality" of the canal, "so that it might be free and open." Decades later, when the United States decided to build an isthmian canal through Panama, and to do so on its own responsibility and with its own funds, it became evident that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty vouchsafed to Great Britain certain privileges that stood in the way of our own independent enterprise. Hence, in 1900, negotiations were opened for a new treaty, one that would give the United States ample freedom in constructing, maintaining, and fortifying a canal of its own. Great Britain renounced its former prerogatives; but the new treaty stipulated that the canal should be open to all nations on terms of commercial equality. The United States gained rights and privileges incomparably broader than it had enjoyed under the old compact, but it unequivocally pledged itself to an equality of toll charges for all nations.

It should be noted in this connection that equality of toll charges applies not only to Great Britain but to all nations using the canal. Our correspondent seems to have the impression that the demand that we live up to our treaty obligations is traceable entirely to certain British interests. As a matter of fact, however, we are bound to fair play with France, Holland, Germany, and all other powers no less than with Great Britain, so that in repealing the clause of the canal act which violates the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we shall not be yielding to British pressure; we shall simply be redeeming our pledge to the world.

The United States can ill afford to become known as an outlaw among nations, as a Government that repudiates solemn contracts and breaks faith with friendly powers. Yet that must be our obloquy if we fail to live squarely up to the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It is not a question of what outsiders wish but of what our own self-respect requires. National honor means national interest. The very fact that the United States is great in strength should make it great in integrity.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. L'ENGLE].

Mr. L'ENGLE. Mr. Speaker, by the indulgence of the membership of this House, and for this manifestation of human kindness and fraternal feeling I shall always be grateful. I have often been excused from attendance on the daily sessions of the Sixty-third Congress since I have been honored by a membership in this distinguished body, in order that I might devote my time to the necessary treatment that is gradually aiding nature to rid me of a severe and prolonged attack of rheumatism. The acute and painful nature of this affliction has prevented me from participating in the business of the House on the floor without great personal discomfiture and the imminent risk of retarding the progress of my recovery. I have attended to my duties at my office and at my home, but I have always been ready, Mr. Speaker, to respond to the call of Democracy, which means the rule of the people, whenever my presence has been needed, whenever a quorum was needed to do business, or whenever the closeness of the division of sentiment of the House has made the issue of a great public question doubtful.

On the question now pending on which the division of the sentiment is so close as to make the defeat of a great American principle probable, and the triumph of that great principle possible only by the vigilance of those devoted to it, I feel it my duty to record what I know to be the sentiment of the people whom I represent, and I have come here to-day to tell you that the great majority of the people of Florida, all of whom I represent upon this floor, is against the repeal of the law exempting ships of American register engaging in the coastwise trade from Panama Canal tolls. [Applause.] They are against it, Mr. Speaker, because they are in favor of asserting at all times and with all emphasis their belief that the people of the United States alone should say what shall be the policy of the United States.

The people of Florida are against this bill because they believe that the great principle of the sovereignty of the United States is greater than that of any expediency which may be cited by anybody as a reason for doing anything in the conduct of our public affairs. Representing these people and knowing how they feel on public questions, because I know them well and keep myself always in close touch with and responsive to their sentiments, I say to you, sir, that I would not be representing them properly if I did not use every means in my power to defeat this bill, which reverses the policy of free tolls to American ships through a canal built with American money and by American brains and initiative—a world marvel—which was indorsed by the people of the United States when they last went to the polls to instruct their representatives as to their will.

It distresses me as an individual to find myself for the first time unable to follow the lead of him whom the people of the United States have chosen as their leader by giving to him the greatest office which they have to give. But as a public servant it pleases me to be able to raise the voice of Florida on this floor, even when that voice cries out against the President of the United States and all others in authority holding views contrary to the views of the people of my State and of my country.

It was to be expected of so great a man as Woodrow Wilson that without direct statement from him the sentiment is publicly expressed that he will not use the almost unlimited power of his great office to retaliate in future official action upon those who now openly oppose him upon this question. It was to be expected of a man big enough to fill, as he has filled it, the chair of Jefferson that he would not put the members of the great party to which he belongs and which has elevated him and them to power in the position of selling their birthright for a mess of post offices.

And it is a distinction that Woodrow Wilson may proudly bear, and one that alone will insure his fame as a great statesman against all the charges of abuse of the power of patronage that the opposition rankling in defeat may bring against him, that he was not even suspected of so mean and petty a thing as retaliation upon men who voiced and voted their convictions in the House of Representatives.

There is but one way, Mr. Speaker, for the people of the United States to express their will, and that way is for the representatives of the great political parties into which they are divided to meet in convention and adopt a written instrument called a platform containing propositions of government which each party asks the people to indorse by intrusting it with the power to carry them out by selecting from among its numbers those to whom the people shall delegate their inherent right to rule. Then, when this is done, the people express their will at the polls by intrusting that party with power whose platform comes the nearest to expressing the governmental ideas of the majority of them.

No contract can be more binding than that made between the people and the representative of the party which they intrusted with power. No obligation can be more sacred than that which binds the members of the party so placed in charge of the Government to live strictly up to the spirit and the letter of the platform on which they appealed to the people, and which by the ratification of it by the people at the polls becomes a contract solemnly and knowingly entered into.

The Democratic Party made such a contract with the people of the United States when its representatives in the Baltimore convention wrote the free-tolls plank in the Democratic platform of 1912, and which was signed and sealed by the people of the United States when they placed the representatives of that party in charge of their Government. I do not have to go any further than this to find a good, sufficient, and binding reason to raise my voice and to cast my vote against this bill which, in terms so specific that no room is left for doubt, violates that solemn contract between the people and the party placed by them in power.

I would vote as the people of the United States instructed me to vote, no matter if I did violate the terms of some treaty or some contract or some agreement made with somebody else. When the people have had the opportunity to express their will, as the people of the United States had but a short while ago on this question, the people can do no wrong, and the duty of those who truly represent the people is to obey when the people have spoken, no matter whose voice, be it individual or nation, is raised in protest. But, Mr. Speaker, in this question my conscience acquits me of failing in agreement with anybody in thus obeying the voice of the people of the United States. There is nothing contained in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which has been paraded here as a sacred obligation binding the honor of the American people, which prohibits us from enacting laws for the government of the Panama Canal, which favor the citizens of the United States above those of other nations. And if we choose to exempt from Panama Canal tolls the ships owned by citizens of the United States instead of granting direct subsidies to them as other nations do, it is our way of doing business from which we should not depart, whether that way meet with the favor or the frown of other nations, until we ourselves have determined to change it.

During the last score of years in which I have been old enough to observe public affairs and to form judgment upon them, I have heard a great deal about the Anglo-Saxon bond which lies between the people of Great Britain and the United States uniting us on terms of cousinly friendship with the great English nation. But this kind of talk has not impressed me very much, because my observation has been, and the cold, bare logic of passing events has proven, that Great Britain is not the friend of this country, except when the advantage of that friendship lies with Great Britain. In fact, whenever Great Britain has believed that we were not strong enough to resist, it was not the olive branch that our English cousins came bearing but the lion's growl that startled our ears. Great are the English people; they have carried law and order into the far corners of the earth; they have never gone into a country that they have not benefited, but in spite of this benevolent assimilation of people who did not want to be assimilated, Great Britain is the greatest bulldozer of all history.

John Bull has been rampaging around the world, seeking whom he could scare, and forcing himself into every place of advantage that he could gain by bluff, bluster, or blood. England was the bully of Europe and expected to be the bully of the world, and made good at it until, like all bullies, she was cut down, and the people of this country were the first in history to make good against the bullying attacks of the beef-eating Briton.

We called this world bully down in 1776. When, not satisfied with this lesson, the bully felt strong enough to come back at us, we repeated the lesson in 1812. And from that time until this, this great world bully, this bulldozer among the nations, this the greatest bluffer in history, this the most selfish nation evolved out of the progress of the human race toward freedom, has come at us in diplomacy and with threat each time it saw a chance to catch us unwary or weak. It is not for us who alone among nations have resisted British influence when we were few in numbers and weak in resource to yield to British selfishness now in this day of our strength.

As to the charge that those who vote to retain the free-tolls provision in the law governing the Panama Canal are recording themselves in favor of subsidy to the Steamship Trust, or are granting special privileges to the 9,000 owners of coastwise ships, and also to the argument that the old Democratic doctrine of special privileges to none is superior in binding force to the later instruction of the people of the United States for free tolls, when upon writing this in their platform they placed the Democratic Party in charge of the Government, the answer to both charges is found in the instruction given by the people to the Democratic Party at the same time they instructed it on the matter of free tolls to break all monopolies and to destroy all trusts. And free canal tolls is no more of a special privilege than that American-owned ships should use free the harbors opened and made possible for their use by money taken out of the Public Treasury by many hundreds of millions more than the cost of the Panama Canal and its operation for a generation.

Let us maintain the sovereignty of the people of the United States by maintaining our position on regulating the Panama Canal. Let us carry out the contract made in 1912 by the party in power with the people of the United States, and then when we have done these things, let us use the great powers of this Government, placed in Democratic hands by the people to whom it belongs, to find out if there is such a thing as a Ship Trust putting unjust burdens upon the people, and to destroy it as quickly as the Democratic majority can get the law through Congress. Let us use this great power to find out if there is a special privilege enjoyed by anyone to the disadvantage of another that we may do away with it at once. But let us not be turned away from our duty to carry out the will of the people of the United States by any cry of "wolf" by whomsoever uttered. [Applause.]

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Speaker, it is a source of much regret to me that I do not find myself in harmony with the President upon the pending bill. I share in full measure the admiration everywhere felt for the splendid qualities of mind and heart that have raised Woodrow Wilson to a high place in the affection and regard of the American people. Because of the great respect I entertain for him and of the confidence I feel in his ability, sincerity, and patriotism my inclination is to always follow him. By reason, however, of convictions formed long ago, and to which I still adhere, I deem it my duty to oppose this bill.

The pending bill goes much farther than the President asked Congress to go.

Section 1 of the pending bill repeals that clause of the existing law which provides that no tolls shall be levied upon the coastwise trade of the United States. That is as far as the President asked Congress to go.

Section 2 of the bill strikes out of the present law the provision that reserves the right of the United States to levy a smaller toll upon our own vessels than upon foreign vessels and negatives forever the right of the United States to prefer its own vessels in either the domestic or foreign commerce.

Great Britain has protested our right not only to remit the tolls but to pay them back after they have been collected, asserting truthfully that there is no difference in principle between the two plans. If, in the face of this protest, we pass the pending bill, the American people, who have hoped that the Panama Canal would be the means of developing a merchant marine worthy of the greatest nation in world, may put their hopes behind them.

Our merchant marine in the foreign trade is very weak, and if we accept the British interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty it always will be.

While Great Britain will not hesitate, if occasion requires it, to subsidize her ships using the Panama route by direct appropriations, our national prejudice against subsidies will preclude us from adopting that policy.

If we can not grant free transit to our ships through the canal, its benefits will accrue to England and not to ourselves.

I do not believe that by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we bartered away to Great Britain the constitutional power of Congress over interstate commerce through the Panama Canal.

If the American people had suspected that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty gave Great Britain equal rights with us in the canal, it would never have been ratified and not a shovelful of dirt would have been turned on the Isthmus. [Applause.]

I stand for a construction of the treaty that vindicates American diplomacy and safeguards our sovereign rights. [Applause.]

In the Sixty-second Congress this House, desiring to preserve our traditional policy of free trade between the States and thus make the Panama Canal a free and unfettered competitor of the transcontinental railroads, voted to remit the tolls upon vessels engaged in our coastwise trade. There was nothing remarkable or revolutionary in the action taken. Indeed it would have been both remarkable and revolutionary had we acted otherwise.

The conclusion of the House was reached after thorough, conscientious, and comprehensive consideration of the subject. The matter was presented from every viewpoint, the question of whether free tolls to our coastwise trade would contravene the Hay-Pauncefote treaty being the prominent subject of the debate. The vote upon the proposal to exempt our domestic commerce from the payment of tolls represented the deliberate conviction of the House that we were not violating our treaty with Great Britain.

It was supposed that the action of the Sixty-second Congress had settled forever the policy of making the Panama Canal free to our interstate commerce as every other American waterway has been from the foundation of the Government. The Democratic national convention and the Progressive national convention indorsed the action in their respective platforms, and the President of the United States approved the bill, declaring his belief that the exemption was clearly within our treaty rights. But immediately after the law was passed a concerted movement was started in this country to manufacture sentiment against it and bring about its arbitration at

The Hague or its repeal. It was boldly proclaimed from certain American quarters that we had violated our treaty with Great Britain, and the Government was called upon to vindicate the national honor by arbitration or repeal of the law.

With these men it mattered not that Great Britain, in her diplomatic correspondence, had admitted our right to make the exemption and that the shipping interests of England and some of her ablest lawyers had declared we were clearly within our treaty rights.

It mattered not that Congress, after conscientious and mature deliberation, had determined that we were not violating our treaty obligations and that the national conventions of two great political parties had upheld the hands of Congress.

It mattered not that the Supreme Court of the United States had passed upon the same question adversely to their contention under another treaty with Great Britain.

Let me call the attention of the House to the first British protest of July 8, 1912, delivered to our Secretary of State, and by him presented to the Senate, while the Panama Canal act was pending there. In that note His Majesty's Government took the position that to exempt all American shipping from the payment of tolls would involve an infraction of the treaty, but as to exempting our coastwise trade it made no such claim.

Mr. A. Mitchell Innes, of the British embassy, in his note of July 8, 1912, after protesting that the proposal to exempt all American shipping from the payment of tolls would involve an infraction of the treaty, says:

> If the trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic, which is reserved for United States vessels, would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken, but it appears to my Government that it would be impossible to frame regulations which would prevent the exemption from resulting, in fact, in a preference to United States shipping, and consequently in an infraction of the treaty.

It will be observed from the foregoing that Great Britain admitted at that time our right to exempt the coastwise trade from the payment of tolls, but doubted our ability to frame regulations that would confine the benefits of the exemption to the coastwise trade.

After this frank admission by His Majesty's Government, the task imposed upon the American champions of the British side was certainly a tremendous one, for it devolved upon them to not only create a sentiment in this country that we had violated the treaty, but to convert Great Britain as well.

Mr. Edward S. Cox-Sinclair, an English authority on international law, in the November, 1912, issue of the Law Magazine and Review, of London, said with reference to the present law:

> That the United States can support its action on the precise words of the material articles of the treaty; that its case is strengthened by reference to the preamble and context; and that its case is difficult to challenge on grounds of general justice.

[Applause.]

Other authorities in England took the same view of the matter.

When the historian writes the story of this Panama Canal legislation he will not revert with any particular feeling of pride to the fact that the assault upon our national honor first came from within and not from without. [Applause.]

Mr. KINDEL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOREMUS. I can not yield.

Shutting their eyes to the fact that Great Britain, so far from claiming that we had violated our treaty in exempting our domestic commerce from tolls, had practically admitted our right to do so, these patriotic defenders of the national honor set about their task with all the zeal and enthusiasm born of unlimited financial resources. The country was flooded with immense quantities of literature, prepared at great expense, boldly declaring that we had broken our plighted faith with Great Britain and demanding arbitration or repeal of the law. As an indication of the vigor with which their campaign was prosecuted, I call attention to the fact that between January 22, 1913, and February 5 of the same year 746,000 copies of an elaborate speech of Senator ELIHU ROOT were purchased at the Government Printing Office and scattered broadcast throughout the country. I assert that not in the entire history of the world has there been such a vast expenditure of money to defend a nation's honor in time of peace. It is quite significant that the efforts to prove the United States an international outlaw became most frantic when our State Department was endeavoring to adjust the matter by diplomatic negotiations with good prospects of success.

The Carnegie Peace Endowment, which derives an annual income of $500,000 from Steel Trust bonds, was most active in rescuing the national honor by promoting the repeal of the law that Great Britain had admitted we had a treaty right to enact. A representative of this institution testified the other day before the Senate lobby investigation committee that it was the business of the endowment to help "straighten things out." But that was the business in which Secretary of State Knox was engaged at the same time. While he was trying to straighten things out in a way that would comport with the dignity and honor of the United States this self-constituted and self-imposed guardian of the national honor was sandbagging his efforts by vigorously upholding the British view. There are, no doubt, some estimable gentlemen connected with the Carnegie Peace Endowment, but as an institution it does not justify its right to exist by antagonizing its own Government in an international controversy.

Some were demanding arbitration at The Hague at a time when the law was a subject of diplomatic negotiations between the two Governments. Although our arbitration treaty with Great Britain provided that we should not arbitrate until after diplomacy had failed, they were demanding arbitration before diplomacy had begun.

Within the limitations of their money and influence they did their utmost to weaken their own Government's position and strengthen that of Great Britain.

It is known that Secretary Knox believes that but for the activity of those who were endeavoring to convince our own people and the world that we were heedless of our treaty obligations, the whole matter would have been satisfactorily adjusted by diplomatic correspondence and the question would not have been forced upon this administration.

I repudiate and denounce the attempts that were made in this country to prove the United States an outlaw among the nations. Our international conduct from earliest times will compare favorably with that of Great Britain or any other power. We are about to dedicate this great canal, built at a cost of $400,000,000 of our own money, to the perpetual use and enjoyment of all nations observing our rules. We have passed a law for the regulation and management of the canal that guarantees to the citizens and subjects of those nations, whether great or small, absolute equality of treatment. We have built the canal with our own blood and treasure, entirely independent of any other nation. After making this great sacrifice, we are not subject to the charge of international outlawry because we have exercised a power which the Constitution confers upon Congress—to regulate our domestic commerce in accordance with our time-honored custom.

Whence came the demand following the passage of the Panama Canal act for arbitration or repeal?

Did it come from the shippers of the United States, who desire cheaper freight rates on land and water?

Did it come from the manufacturers of the East and the great Middle West, who are ambitious to extend their markets?

Did it come from a nation of consumers who want cheaper freight rates for their coal, lumber, iron, and agricultural and manufactured products?

No, Mr. Speaker, none of these lifted their voice in opposition to the law.

I can conceive of no interest that would profit by imposing tolls upon our coastwise trade at the canal, except the transcontinental railroads. Does anyone doubt that, if they could arrange the matter to suit themselves, the toll would be $5 per ton instead of $1.20? Does anyone doubt that, if they could have their way about it, competition through the canal would be annihilated and its use to the people as a transportation agency destroyed? This question affects every ton of American freight that will pass through the canal from coast to coast, and every ton that will be transported by the transcontinental railroads. This is true as to freight rates between points on the Atlantic and the Pacific and also as to rates from the interior of the country to the coast.

It is well known that the water route between American points on the Atlantic and Pacific has always controlled, to a large extent, the transcontinental freight rate. This was true of the first route via Cape Horn and of the routes that were afterwards established via the Isthmus of Panama, the Straits of Magellan and Tehuantepec. The Interstate Commerce Commission, reviewing the history of these various water routes in their twenty-fifth annual report, states that the water rate has always been somewhat lower than the rail rate from New York to San Francisco; and the commission found that water transportation had limited the rate charged by rail carriers between Atlantic and Pacific points.

If this be true, it follows that any burden placed upon interstate commerce at the canal destroys to that extent its usefulness as a competitor of the transcontinental railroads and takes from the American people the benefits that would follow free and unfettered competition. The benefits of free commerce through the canal would not be limited to the territory along our two seaboards, but would be enjoyed by that great section of our country lying between the Atlantic and the Rocky Mountains.

The principle for which the advocates of free tolls contend was well expressed by Mr. Cleveland in his first inaugural message when discussing the importance of an interoceanic canal:

> Transportation is a factor in the cost of commodities scarcely second to that of their production and weighs as heavily upon the consumer. Our experience already has proven the great importance of having competition between land carriage and water carriage fully developed, each acting as a protection to the public against the tendency to monopoly which is inherent in the consolidation of wealth and power in the hands of vast corporations

It goes without saying that competition between land carriage and water carriage can not be fully developed if tollgates are interposed in the path of either.

Scattered all through the Middle West are great manufacturing plants. They have competitors located upon the Atlantic seaboard. Both are interested in extending their markets into the great territory lying along the Pacific coast. The manufacturers of Detroit, Cleveland, Chicago, and St. Louis must have a freight rate by rail to the Pacific that will enable them to compete with their eastern rivals, who will use the Panama route. In other words, they must meet the market competition of the eastern manufacturers, and they can not do this unless the railroads meet the competition of the water route. That the railroads will meet this competition there can be no doubt. As pointed out by the Interstate Commerce Commission in its twenty-fifth annual report—

> It is for the interest of the rail line which begins at Chicago to apply a lower rate from Chicago than is applied from New York, since if the traffic originates at Chicago, that line obtains the entire freight money, while if the traffic originates at New York it must divide the transportation charges with its connections east of Chicago, which brings the traffic from the Atlantic seaboard.

For a more potent reason it is for the interest of the rail line which begins in the interior of the country to apply a rate that will compete with the water rate, for if the traffic moves by water the rail line will lose the business entirely. It should also be borne in mind that the cheaper the commodity moves through the canal the farther it will move by the rail line from coast points to the interior.

It is the judgment of men familiar with the transportation problems of this country that if the Panama Canal is made free to our interstate commerce it will become a natural regulator of transcontinental freight rates.

As I endeavored to point out in discussing this question on a former occasion:

> The manufacturer of automobiles in Detroit must have a rail rate to the Pacific coast that will be fairly competitive with the water rate given the manufacturer of automobiles on the Atlantic seaboard. The furniture manufacturer at Grand Rapids must have a rail rate to the Pacific coast that will be fairly competitive with the water rate of the eastern manufacturer of furniture. The bathtub manufacturer at Chicago demands a rate by rail to the West that will enable him to compete with the bathtub manufacturer at New York, who uses the water route. These examples might be multiplied indefinitely. The manufacturers of Detroit, Grand Rapids, Chicago, St. Louis, and other cities must meet the market competition of their eastern rivals, and to enable them to do so the railroads must meet the competition of the water route. If this is not done, both manufacturers and railroads will lose their business.

The point I desire to emphasize is that the force of market competition alone will require the railroads to meet the competition of the water route, thus benefiting not only those who live along our two seaboards but the great central and western sections of the country.

But we are told by the other side that we can not afford to haggle over a paltry matter of tolls. A paltry matter indeed! A toll of $1.20 means $9,600 for a ship of 8,000 tons registered capacity, or $12,000 for a ship of 10,000 tons net registered capacity. So far from being a paltry matter, this charge will prove a very serious handicap to the development of trade through the canal, particularly to the independent tramp steamers, upon which we must rely to maintain competitive conditions of traffic. When viewed in this light and as an instrumentality for regulating transcontinental freight rates, the remission of tolls becomes a matter of transcendent importance to the American people.

It seems strange that those who oppose free tolls consistently overlook one of the great purposes for which the canal was built, namely, that of giving the American people a competitor of the transcontinental railroads, and that the imposition of burdens upon our interstate commerce through the canal tends to defeat that purpose. Instead of discouraging commerce through this new waterway we ought to encourage it by every legitimate method and thus develop a traffic among our own people that will demonstrate the wisdom of those who conceived and carried into execution this splendid enterprise.

It is said, however, that the remission of tolls to vessels plying between the Atlantic and the Pacific will not result in a reduction of freight rates through the canal, but that the steamboat lines will pocket the tolls, thus conferring a subsidy upon a shipping monopoly. This argument, of course, assumes that it will be impossible to maintain competitive conditions of traffic through the canal. It presupposes the creation of a monopoly where none now exists. It may be true that combinations in restraint of trade now exist in certain branches of American shipping, but I call attention to the fact that we now have an administration pledged to the principle that a private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable. Section 11 of the Panama Canal act bars out of the canal any vessel owned, chartered, operated, or controlled by any person or company doing business in violation of the Sherman antitrust law and provides that suit may be brought by any shipper or by the Attorney General of the United States. To assume that our domestic trade through the Panama Canal, and which of necessity has not yet been brought into existence, will be controlled by any combination of interests is to assume that such combination will be more powerful than the Government of the United States.

If we have constructed this canal for the use of a private monopoly, what a confidence game has been played on the American people! What a pity some one did not suggest 12 years ago that we were preparing to spend $400,000,000 on a waterway through which a shipping trust could exploit the people! One of the great objects of the canal was to secure water competition with the railroads, and now after 10 years of labor and sacrifice we are told there is to be no competition. We are coolly informed that we should not allow our domestic ships free transit through the canal because their owners will cut the freight rate just enough under the rail rate to obtain the business. If this is true, Mr. Speaker, we are indeed a much-exploited people. We gave away millions of dollars in land values to aid the transcontinental railroads, and they repaid our generosity with rebates, discriminations, and exorbitant charges. We have built a canal at great cost to compete with these same railroads only to find it in the grasp of a private monopoly. Is it any wonder people are beginning to ask why we built the canal?

But I do not indulge in such a gloomy outlook; I have great confidence in the future of the Panama Canal. I believe it is destined to become, with proper encouragement, a great highway of interstate commerce through which will pass in constantly increasing volume the products of the American farm and mill and factory. Let us give it a chance to show what it can do. Let us not burden its commerce with artificial restraints that will impair its usefulness to the people and discourage the realization of one of the great objects for which it has been built.

If tolls are charged at the canal, they will be added to the freight rate and paid by the American people. In fact, any tax that interferes with the free interchange of commodities is paid by the purchaser of the commodities. This is an economic truth, whether the tax be paid at a tollgate or at a customhouse. A toll collected at the Panama Canal would operate much the same as a tax collected at the customhouse. While the Government is collecting the tax at the customhouse, the beneficiary, the domestic manufacturer, is collecting an additional price from the consumer. While the Government is collecting its toll at the Panama Canal, the beneficiaries, the American railroads, will be collecting additional freight charges from the people.

While I have always opposed a direct subsidy from the Federal Treasury to aid any private enterprise, I refuse to be frightened by the cry of "subsidy" as applied to free tolls for our domestic commerce using the Panama Canal. The law of 1912 providing free tolls for our coastwise trade is no different in principle than the act of July 4, 1789, providing for a discriminatory duty upon goods imported in American ships. That law gave a discount of 10 per cent of the tariff duties upon commodities imported in ships built and owned by American citizens. This discrimination in favor of American shipping laid the foundation for our splendid merchant marine of earlier days, and was never regarded as a subsidy to a special interest.

We derive revenue for the support of the Government by levying duties at the customhouse. By remitting 10 per cent of these duties on goods carried in American bottoms we kept that much money out of the Treasury, but left it in the pockets of the people, at the same time developing our merchant marine. We will get our revenue for the operation of the canal by the collection of tolls. By remitting these tolls to our coastwise trade we will keep that much money out of the Treasury, but leave it in the pockets of the people, at the same time developing the domestic arm of our merchant marine. The principle is the same in each instance. If one is a subsidy, both are subsidies. If the proposition for which I contend is a subsidy, then this House declared for a subsidy when it passed the Underwood tariff law, for that act carried a discriminatory duty of 5 per cent on goods imported in American vessels.

If free tolls for our coastwise trade at the Panama Canal constitutes a subsidy, then we gave a subsidy to 40,000,000 tons of domestic commerce that passed through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal last year and have subsidized every American craft that has sailed the rivers, harbors, and canals of this country since our system of internal improvements began. [Applause.]

Notwithstanding we have expended upward of $700,000,000 in the encouragement of commerce and navigation upon all of our waterways, no one ever conceived the idea of erecting a tollgate in the path of the trade we were trying to promote. Perfect freedom of trade between all our people has been a fixed policy from the beginning of the Government to the present hour, and the law which it is now proposed to repeal applied that historic policy to the Panama Canal.

THE HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

An attempt has been made to liken the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to our treaties of commerce and navigation, and particularly to our treaty with Great Britain governing the use of the waters that separate Canada and the United States. That there is a vast distinction ought to be apparent upon a moment's reflection. Take, for instance, our treaty of commerce and navigation with Great Britain made in 1815. She has certain rivers, harbors, and ports; we have certain rivers, harbors, and ports. In that treaty she agreed to give our ships the same treatment in her waters that she gives her own. In consideration thereof we agreed to treat her ships in our waters the same as we treat our own. Now, take the treaty regulating the use of the boundary waters between Canada and the United States. Canada has certain canals, rivers, and lakes, and so have we. By that treaty with Great Britain we grant her the same rights in our waterways that she grants us in her waterways. It is a purely reciprocal agreement, and the same consideration flows to one that flows to the other.

Now, take this canal treaty, which they tell us is of the same character as all these other treaties. What consideration flows to us for opening up this great waterway to the commerce of Great Britain? What do we receive in return? Where is her canal across the Isthmus that we are to use in return for giving her the use of our canal? Is it possible there is a Member of this House who can not see the fundamental distinction between the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and our various reciprocal treaties of commerce and navigation?

In 1850 the United States and Great Britain entered into the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, by which they engaged to guarantee the neutrality of a ship canal to be constructed by way of the San Juan River and Lake Nicaragua. It was contemplated at the time that the canal would be constructed by an American company that had obtained a concession for that purpose under a treaty between Nicaragua and the United States. In the Clayton-Bulwer treaty the two Governments assumed a joint protectorate over the canal and the company that was to build it, and in return for joint protection article 8 of the treaty provided that the owners of the canal should keep it open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms. It also provided that the canal should be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which was willing to grant such protection as the United States and Great Britain engaged to afford. Equal treatment, in other words, was conditioned upon joint protection.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 superseded the Clayton-Bulwer treaty in express terms. All that remained of the former treaty was the "general principle" of article 8, to which I will refer later. By the new treaty it was contemplated that the canal would be built by the Government of the United States at its own expense, and Great Britain voluntarily withdrew the protection to which she was obligated by the earlier treaty. The United States thus became the sole protector of the canal, and neither Great Britain nor any other power is to-day obligated to unite with us in guaranteeing its neutrality. The entire burden for all time falls upon the United States.

The guaranty of joint protection under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty having been the consideration for equal treatment, and the guaranty of joint protection having disappeared in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, the question arises, What consideration now supports Great Britain's claim of equal treatment?

Let us look for the answer to this question in the British correspondence. Turning to Sir Edward Grey's note of November 14, 1912, we find the following language set forth as the consideration for Great Britain's claim of equal rights in the canal:

They (His Majesty's Government) consider that by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty the United States had surrendered the right to construct the canal, and that by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty they recovered that right upon the footing that the canal should be open to British and United States vessels upon terms of equal treatment.

In other words, Great Britain urges as the consideration for equal treatment the recovery by the United States of the right to construct the canal. I think I state the British contention correctly. Let us see if this construction will stand the test of even the briefest analysis. Turning to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, we find that section 1 of article 3 reads as follows:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

So we find that under this treaty all other nations as well as Great Britain are entitled to equal treatment, the only condition being that they observe the rules adopted by the United States. What consideration supports the right of Germany, France, Japan, or any other nation to equal treatment? They clearly have the right under the treaty as long as they observe the rules, although they surrendered nothing in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. If they fail to observe the rules, they lose the right to equal treatment. It is true Great Britain has a contractual right to use the canal, but that right is also conditioned upon her observance of the rules, the same as the right of every other nation to the use of the canal is conditioned upon their observance of the rules. Will anyone contend that if Great Britain failed to observe the rules her situation with reference to the use of the canal would be different from that of any other nation that failed to observe the rules?

Following this construction of the existing treaty, let us refer to the original Hay-Pauncefote treaty of February 5, 1900, which contained the following language:

ARTICLE 3. The high contracting parties will immediately upon the exchange of the ratification of the convention bring it to the notice of the other powers and invite them to adhere to it.

The foregoing article was stricken out in the Senate, and by reason of this and several amendments made in the Senate Great Britain rejected the treaty. In commenting upon the action of the Senate in striking out article 3, Lord Lansdowne, in the subsequent negotiations of August 3, 1901, said:

The omission of the article inviting the adherence of other powers placed this country in a position of marked disadvantage compared with other powers. While the United States would have a treaty right to interfere with the canal in time of war or apprehended war, and while other powers could with a clear conscience disregard any of the restrictions imposed by the convention of 1900, Great Britain alone would be absolutely precluded from resorting to any such action or from taking measures to secure her interest in and near the canal.

In the same communication Lord Lansdowne said:

While indifferent as to the form in which the point is met, I must emphatically renew the objections of His Majesty's Government to being bound by stringent rules of neutral conduct not equally binding upon other powers. I would therefore suggest the insertion in rule 1, after "all nations," of the words "which shall agree to observe these rules." This addition will impose upon other powers the same self-denying ordinance as Great Britain is desired to accept and will furnish an additional security for the neutrality of the canal, which it will be the duty of the United States to maintain.

It will be observed from the above that Lord Lansdowne emphatically objected to having His Majesty's Government bound by rules of neutral conduct not equally binding upon other powers—not equally binding upon the United States, but upon other powers.

The view of the United States as to the suggested change of phraseology by Lord Lonsdowne is indicated in his communication to Mr. Lowther of September 12, 1901:

With regard to the changes suggested by His Majesty's Government Mr. Hay was apprehensive that the first amendment proposed to clause 1 of article 3 would meet with opposition because of the strong objection entertained to inviting other powers to become contract parties to a treaty affecting the canal. If His Majesty's Government found it not convenient to accept the draft as it stood, they might perhaps consider favorably the substitution for the words "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations which shall agree to observe these rules" the words "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules," and instead of "any nation so agreeing," the words "any such nation." This, it seemed to Mr. Hay, would accomplish the purpose aimed at by His Majesty's Government.

That the suggestion of Mr. Hay to insert the words "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules" was satisfactory to the British Government is shown in Lord Lansdowne's letter to Lord Pauncefote on October 21, 1901, in which he says:

Mr. Hay has suggested that in article 3, rule 1, we should substitute for the words "The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations which shall agree to observe these rules," etc., the words "The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules," and in the same clause as a consequential amendment, to substitute for the words "any nation so agreeing" the words "any such nation." His Majesty's Government were prepared to accept this amendment, which seemed to us equally efficacious for the purpose which we had in view, namely, that of insuring that Great Britain should not be placed in a less advantageous position than other powers, while they stopped short of conferring upon other nations a contractual right to the use of the canal.

The above-quoted correspondence does not indicate that Great Britain was insisting upon equal treatment with the United States in the use of the canal, but rather was trying to insure that she should not be placed in a less advantageous position than other powers while conferring upon them no contractual right to the use of the canal.

In further support of my contention that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty does not guarantee to Great Britain equal rights with the United States in the canal, I call attention to the significant fact that the words of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty declaring that the canal shall be "open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms" disappear in the later treaty. Can there be any doubt that if the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was intended to give Great Britain equal rights with the United States in the Panama Canal the intention would have been expressed in the same clear and unequivocal terms that are found in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty? The language of that treaty guaranteeing equal rights to both countries had constituted a continuing contract for half a century. It was before the respective representatives of the two Governments when they negotiated the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and the failure to incorporate the language in the new treaty is significant to say the least.

In their report accompanying this bill the majority of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, following the interpretation of Sir Edward Grey, contend that the "general principle" of neutralization in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which was not impaired by the later treaty, guarantees equal rights to Great Britain in the canal. Article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, upon which Great Britain bases her claim of equal treatment, reads as follows:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection by treaty stipulations to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

A careful reading of this article in connection with the other provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty will disclose that it lays down no principle of neutralization at all, but merely applies the rules of neutralization established in the preceding articles for the Nicaragua Canal to routes that were at that time being proposed via Panama and Tehuantepec.

In other words, the principle of neutralization was made general by applying it to all interoceanic communications across the Isthmus, but the principle was established in the articles that preceded article 8. The neutrality guaranteed by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty undoubtedly meant that the canal should be protected from interruption, seizure, or unjust confiscation, as stated in article 5 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, so that the canal should forever be open and free and the capital invested therein secure. The United States and Great Britain having engaged with each other to guarantee that neutrality, they provided in article 8, as a condition of such guaranty, that the canal should be open to the citizens and subjects of both countries upon equal terms, and also provided that it should be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which was willing to unite with the United States and Great Britain in a joint protectorate over the canal. To assert that the general principle of neutralization established in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty refers to a system of equal tolls, which in that treaty was conditional upon joint protection, does violence to the meaning of the word "neutralization" as it has been understood from time immemorial. [Applause.]

In Moore's International Law Digest "neutralization" is defined as follows:

Strictly speaking, the term "neutralization," when applied to a canal, refers to a condition under which the canal would be closed to the ships of war of belligerents. The term, however, has come to be used in a broader sense than this, so as to include an arrangement whereby protection is sought to be guaranteed against hostile attack or hostile interruption, while the same freedom of use is sought to be assured in war as in peace.

Unless the word "neutralization" is to be given a new and strange meaning, the general principle established by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty has not been impaired by the act of August 24, 1912. The canal will be free and open on terms of entire equality to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations that observe the rules the United States has laid down for the neutralization of the canal.

To support their claim that Great Britain has equal rights with the United States in the Panama Canal, the opponents of free tolls are obliged to change the plain and well understood meaning of words, read into the new treaty the language of a superseded convention, and ignore the fundamental rights of the United States as the sovereign proprietor of the canal and the sole guarantor of its neutrality.

Whatever differences may exist as to the right of the United States to exempt its foreign shipping from the payment of tolls, I do not see how other nations are concerned in any preference we may give to our coastwise trade. For nearly a hundred years that trade has been reserved by law to vessels of the United States, and no foreign ship can engage in it. In his note of November 14, 1912, Sir Edward Grey, in trying to demonstrate the inability of this Government to confine the exemption to the coastwise trade, used the following illustration:

To take an example, if cargo intended for a United States port beyond the canal, either from east or west, and shipped on board a foreign ship, could be sent to its destination more cheaply through the operation of the proposed exemption by being landed at a United States port before reaching the canal, and then sent on as coastwise trade, shippers would benefit by adopting this course in preference to sending the goods direct to their destination through the canal on board the foreign ship.

Without discussing the question whether such a practice as Sir Edward Grey suggested would ever be adopted, the point was well met by Secretary of State Knox in his note of January 17, 1913, when he said that it rested upon conjecture as to what may happen rather than upon proved facts. If the practice of unloading foreign goods at an American port upon either side of the canal and reloading them upon an American vessel for passage through the canal as coastwise trade were attempted there is no doubt of the ability of this Government to frame regulations that would effectually stop the practice. The mere suggestion, of course, that such a thing might be attempted is not an argument showing or tending to show that the present law violates the treaty, nor does it afford any justification for its repeal.

Sir Edward Grey is apprehensive that the remission of tolls to our coastwise trade would violate the rule that the tolls levied shall be just and equitable by requiring foreign shipping to pay an unjust share of the cost of the upkeep of the canal. He feels, therefore, that his Government is entitled to demand that all vessels passing through the canal, whatever their flag or character, shall be taken into account in fixing the amount of the tolls. It would seem to be a complete answer to this argument that all vessels were taken into account in fixing the maximum toll in the Panama Canal act at $1.25 per net registered ton.

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce held very exhaustive hearings for the purpose of determining the rate of tolls that would prove attractive to commerce and permit of the use of the canal by the nations of the world. According to Prof. Johnson, upon whose estimates the committee relied in fixing the maximum toll of $1.25 per ton, 8,788,000 tons of foreign shipping would use the canal during the first year of its operation. The same authority estimated that there would be 720,000 tons of American shipping in foreign commerce and 1,000,000 tons of American shipping in the coast-to-coast trade. These estimates guided Congress in fixing the maximum tolls, and the fact that Congress decided to remit the tolds to the coastwise trade did not cast upon other shipping an unjust burden for its maintenance. The tolls were fixed for the purpose of getting trade and would have remained the same whether the coastwise vessels were exempt or not.

The tolls fixed by the President at $1.20 per ton are admitted by everybody to be just and equitable. We would certainly be entitled to tolls that would pay the cost of maintaining the canal and meet the interest on the bonds issued for its construction. As the tolls fixed fall far short of that, it is difficult to see how foreign shipping can complain. It would seem that Great Britain has signally failed to show that her shipping would be discriminated against by the present law.

I feel that if this bill passes we will lose something that we ought to keep and that some day we may regret it. I had fondly hoped that the Panama Canal would be started in a way that would promote the great object for which it was conceived, by developing the freest competition with rail transportation and encouraging the exchange of products among our own people through this new and untried waterway.

If I believed this Government had contravened the Hay-Pauncefote treaty by the preference we have given our coastwise trade through the Panama Canal, I would view this question in a different light. I yield to no Member of this House in my desire to preserve inviolate our treaty obligations. I want the United States to dwell among the nations of the earth in peace and concord, actuated always by a keen desire to accord equal justice to all. I would apply that rule of conduct to the weakest as well as to the strongest of nations, thus winning for us the confidence and esteem of mankind everywhere. But, Mr. Speaker, in the pursuit of that policy we are not called upon to relinquish a right which all nations exercise freely and without challenge to regulate their domestic commerce in their own way. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE].

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I beg to advert for one moment to the construction of the Baltimore platform. In that pronouncement there are two planks or pledges. One prohibits subsidies, the other favors the exemption of tolls, which is in its nature a subsidy. Democrats must choose between such a conflict, and in so doing I shall abide by the time-honored Democratic plank against subsidies. [Applause.]

But beyond and above the party platform is my oath at the bar of this House to support the Constitution, treaties, and laws made in pursuance thereof, and when those treaties conflict with a platform my oath requires me to subordinate the platform to the treaty, which is the supreme law of the land.

THE POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES.

After this observation permit me to invite attention to the treaty aspects of the question now under consideration. I shall first address myself to the actual policy of the United States for the period of time antedating the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

On May 8, 1826, Henry Clay, Secretary of State, in writing to the Panama Congress—not speaking upon the floor of this House, but acting under the solemn responsibility of his great office upon the policy of our Government as to an Isthmian Canal—said:

> That vast object, if it should be ever accomplished, will be interesting, in a greater or less degree, to all parts of the world * * *. If the work should ever be executed so as to admit of the passage of sea vessels from ocean to ocean, the benefits of it ought not to be exclusively appropriated to any one nation, but should be extended to all parts of the globe upon the payment of a just compensation or reasonable tolls.

[Applause.]

Thus early Clay, the Secretary of State, declared the policy and purpose of our Government as to this marvelous undertaking. So what he may have said elsewhere and upon another subject in reminding Members of this House that they were not members of the House of Commons is utterly irrelevant. I give his language, pertinent and concrete and official.

Again, on March 3, 1835, the United States Senate adopted a resolution in relation to its request that the President continue his negotiations respecting an Isthmian Canal, and declaring for—> the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and of securing forever, by such stipulations, the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all such nations on the payment of such reasonable tolls as may be established.

And on March 2, 1839, Mr. Mercer, a distinguished Member of this House, from my own State, and chairman of the Committee on Roads and Canals, brought in a report—unanimously agreed to by the House—urging the Executive Department to continue its negotiations, and especially with Panama, for the purpose of effecting—> the construction of a ship channel or canal across the Isthmus, and securing forever, by suitable treaty stipulations, the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all nations.

The Mexican War, even before its conclusion, directed attention to the vast territory that would inevitably accrue to the western portion of our country upon the result of that conflict. So we concluded a treaty with New Granada—subsequently Colombia—signed at Bogota December 12, 1846, but ratifications not exchanged until June 10, 1848, to the end that there should be an interoceanic communication through the Isthmus of Panama, and that the United States and its citizens should have the right to transport produce and commerce over such canal, and that the tolls levied and collected of the United States must be no greater than those levied and collected of New Granada. In other words, the design of the treaty was to guarantee perfect equality to such isthmian transportation, whether by a canal or railway, between the United States and New Granada.

I have heretofore observed that the result of the Mexican War began to direct the attention of the Nation to the immense potentialities of our western country. At that time transcontinental railroads were vaguely and dimly thought of. The transportation then mainly known was in the form of highways and canals. But our Government was becoming active at the prospects. Mr. Clayton, then Secretary of State, wrote to William C. Rives, our minister to France, to sound the British Government upon the subject of an interoceanic canal across Central America. Mark you, this was upon our own initiative, not England's. Mr. Rives, replying under date of September 25, 1849, stated the result of his interview with Palmerston, a portion of which I now quote:

> That the United States sought no exclusive privilege or preferential right of any kind in regard to the proposed communication, and their sincere wish, if it should be found practicable, was to see it [the canal] dedicated to the common use of all nations, on the most liberal terms and a footing of perfect equality for all.
> That the United States would not, if it could, obtain any exclusive right or privilege in a great highway which naturally belonged to all mankind.
> That while they aimed at no exclusive privilege for themselves, they could never consent to see so important a communication fall under the exclusive control of any other great commercial power.

Senator Davis in his great report of April 5, 1900, approved in this particular by Senator Morgan, declared that this letter—

> Initiated and explained our fixed policy as to a canal through the Isthmus of Darien.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have brought the policy and purpose of the United States, as expressed by Clay, Secretary of State; as expressed by the Senate, a branch of the treaty-making power; as expressed by the House of Representatives, the organ of the grea body of the people; as expressed by the convention with New Granada, a solemn international assurance, and as expressed by the letter of Mr. Rives, so clearly disclosing to Great Britain the policy of America, down to the moment of making of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, in order that the House may fully appreciate the meaning and purpose of that treaty as well as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

From these official acts and declarations I am justified, Mr. Speaker, in affirming that from 1826 down to 1850 there was only one thought in the mind of the American Government, and that was that whenever a canal should cut through the ligament that binds the northern and southern continents of this hemisphere, such a canal should be free and open to all mankind upon fair and equal conditions.

CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

I therefore assert that no other thought or purpose was in the minds of the negotiators when they came to adopt the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of April 19, 1850. To give a preferential right to our Nation or to the commerce of any nation in view of the evidence I have submitted is inconceivable.

Mr. Speaker, our Government initiated the negotiations for the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, as I have before stated. We were eager for this treaty. We employed a secret treaty made with Nicaragua by our agent, Mr. Heis, and a similar treaty with Honduras, effectuated by Mr. Squire, each giving the exclusive right to the United States to establish a canal through the territories of these States, in order to coerce the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. The Heis and Squire treaties were never ratified, but they were placed before Great Britain with the ominous implication that unless she did sign the Clayton-Bulwer convention these treaties with Nicaragua and Honduras would be consummated. I make this statement upon the authority of the Davis report and the Morgan report, so that the Members may fully realize that our Government was the ardent solicitor of the Clayton-Bulwer agreement. The threat of the Heis and Squire treaties was effective; and we gave up the exclusive rights therein granted the United States and entered into an agreement—the Clayton-Bulwer treaty—with the British Government to extend joint protection and control over an interoceanic communication by canal or by rail in Tehuantepec or Panama.

The idea and purpose of equality of treatment and neutralization loomed large in this treaty. It was the dominant intent. This will clearly appear from article 6, which declared that the "great design" of this treaty was—> that of constructing and maintaining the said canal as a ship communication between the two oceans for the benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all, and of protecting the same.

And article 8 of this treaty accentuated the "great design" of the two nations and enlarged the territorial area within which the canal could be located so as to include Panama. I add, however, in order to save time, that I will deal later and more specifically with this article.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, to quote the Davis report:

In the origin of our claim to the right of way for our people and our produce, armies, mails, and other property through a canal which our citizens had contracted with Nicaragua to build we offered to dedicate the canal to the equal use of mankind. We offered to make it neutral ground and denied to our Government the exclusive right to use and control it.

As to neutrality and the exclusive control of the canal and its dedication to universal use, the suggestions that were incorporated in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty came from the United States and were concurred in by Great Britain.

In no instance has the Government of the United States intimated an objection to this treaty on account of the features of neutrality and its equal and impartial use by all other nations. Nor has this Government ever proposed to Great Britain to cancel, amend, or annul the entire treaty or any separate part of it until the present negotiation, which resulted in the convention now before the committee for consideration, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Mr. Speaker, in all this time no American statesman ever questioned the meaning of the equality provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. That we had controversies with Great Britain about this treaty is true, but these disputes in no way questioned the binding effect of this treaty or its stipulations in respect of equality. The disputes that did arise were mainly in relation to the possessions of Great Britain and the Mosquito Coast protectorate, we insisting all the time that she must adhere to the treaty. So we are estopped to deny that Great Britain had interests, and large material interests, under this treaty; and we are, by our own solemn acts of interpretation, likewise bound to concede that Great Britain gave up valuable considerations under this treaty for the benefits which she was to gain under the subsequent and substituted treaty, known as the Hay-Pauncefote convention.

HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

We should remember that the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty would have left Great Britain in the full possession of the territorial rights acquired by her treaties with Guatemala and Honduras, and especially certain canal rights granted her by Nicaragua in a treaty of August 28, 1860; and, in speaking of this last treaty, the Davis report observes that—

Great Britain has a claim to the exclusive control of the canal that is very important to her, in that the British possessions and the Dominion of Canada have coasts and great seaports on both oceans.

So, I repeat, Great Britain gave up substantial rights and benefits given her by this treaty in consideration of the benefits and rights accorded her in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It is idle to assert the contrary now, for our diplomatic relations with her arise to confound and refute such a contention.

The United States, however, at the close of the Spanish-American War, and in anticipation of the report of the Canal Commission, desired to abrogate the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and to obtain by a new treaty the exclusive right to build, control, and protect the canal, either by our Government itself or by individuals or corporations under its auspices or aid. To this end, Mr. Speaker, Secretary Hay, on December 7, 1898, addressed Mr. Henry White, at London, and advised him that inasmuch as an isthmian canal as a—means of communication seemed at this moment indispensable, both for our commercial and national interest—

he was directed to ask Lord Salisbury—whether it may not be possible to secure such modification of the provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as to admit such action by the Government of the United States as may render possible the accomplishment of a work, which will be for the benefit of the entire civilized world. The President hopes he may take it for granted that the British Government not only have no wish to prevent the accomplishment of this great work, but that they feel a lively interest in it and appreciate the fact that the benefits of its successful achievement will be to the advantage not only of England and America, but of all nations.

On December 21, 1898, Mr. White had an interview with Lord Salisbury and read the instructions of the Secretary of State to his lordship but did not leave a copy with him. The matter was fully discussed by these representatives of the two Governments, and Mr. White reports in a letter to Secretary Hay of December 22, 1898, among other things, as follows:

A brief informal conversation followed, during which Lord Salisbury said nothing to leave me to suppose that he is unfavorably disposed, much less hostile, to the construction of the canal under our auspices, provided it is open to the ships of all countries on equal terms.

I should add that on the very day of the conversation between Lord Salisbury and our representative—December 21, 1898—Mr. White wired Secretary Hay the purport of this conversation and concluded his telegram with this language:

He [Lord Salisbury] said nothing indicative of opposition, much less hostility, on the part of Her Majesty's Government to the construction of the canal, and I do not believe, if it is to be open to all nations on equal terms, that there will be any serious difficulty in effecting an agreement satisfactory to both Nations.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, these preliminary negotiations, which show the understanding or common mind on the subject, demonstrate beyond cavil that the British Government was willing to concede all that the United States desired, provided that in the new treaty the canal should, to quote the language of the telegram of Mr. White, be "open to all nations on equal terms."

This was the very crux of the negotiations, and if Great Britain did not secure this particular benefit for herself and other nations, then she gave up the Clayton-Bulwer treaty without any consideration whatever. Surely no intelligent and open mind would think Great Britain so stupid as to make so ample a relinquishment of all her rights without consideration. And yet this is the position of the gentlemen who oppose the repeal of the statute exempting tolls.

It is pertinent, Mr. Speaker, to have the testimony of the Hon. Joseph H. Choate, the American ambassador who concluded and perfected these negotiations with England. I therefore desire to quote from his speech delivered on December 4, 1913, before the American Society for Judicial Settlement, in which he said:

And now, before I call upon any other speakers, I want to say a single word more about another thing that seems to me entirely practical, and that is that we must somehow or other get out of the way the embarrassment that rests upon our Nation, the distrust that is felt toward our Nation, because of the situation of what is called the Panama Canal bill. Now, I know that men differ about that, as to what the agreement was. The agreement, as I think and always have thought, speaks for itself, that the vessels of all nations shall pass through the canal on equal terms, exactly as it says; but distinguished people have taken a different view from that, and they have said that they can read in the word "other"—that the vessels of all other nations than the United States shall pass through the canal on equal terms. Well, I had something to do with the negotiation of that treaty. It so happens that Lord Pauncefote was in London during that whole summer which ended in the making of the treaty, and it was intrusted by Lord Lansdowne, the foreign secretary, to him, and by our Secretary, Mr. Hay, to me, and we spent hours and days in the negotiations; and I want to say for both of those distinguished men, Lord Pauncefote and Mr. Hay, two of the noblest, truest, purest statesmen that ever lived, that I am sure it never crossed the mind of either of them, or of myself, who was mediating between them, that the treaty, in the language that I have referred to, meant anything else than exactly what it said. But, as I have said, other men quite as wise as we are could read in the word "other." Mr. Taft succeeded in reading it in, and Congress read it in, and they passed and he signed the bill; and there it is with that clause in it, which declares that instead of all nations having the use of the canal on equal terms the coastwise shipping of the United States shall pass through free of toll.

So, Mr. Speaker, the "great design" embodied in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which expressed the policy of Henry Clay, of the United States Senate, of the House of Representatives, and of Minister Rives, and which was substantially approved by Secretary Cass, President Polk, and Secretary Blaine, was found to be the existing policy and principle of our Government and clearly understood at the time of the negotiation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Indeed no other idea than that involved in the "great design"—that is, a canal "between the two oceans for the benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all"—was in the minds of the American negotiators of this treaty. No exemption or preference was then thought of or hinted at. Equality of treatment of the commerce of all nations was our affirmative and insistent declaration. We invited Great Britain to make the new treaty upon this solemn assurance, which was plainly understood, I repeat, by the distinguished negotiators on the part of the United States.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty was signed at Washington November 18, 1901, and ratified February 21, 1902. Secretary Hay, in submitting this treaty to the Senate, accompanied it with a confidential memorandum from which I make the following pertinent quotation:

(2) The President takes the position that the United States built the canal at its sole cost for the equal benefit of all nations.

(3) The general principle of neutralization and equality has always been insisted upon by the United States, and it has recognized in this way the justice of the request of Great Britain on condition that she surrendered important national and material interests in the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. So that this general principle and its application to the sovereignty of Panama should be maintained.

(4) These rules (based on neutralization and equality) are adopted in the treaty with Great Britain as a consideration for getting rid of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

(5) Upon the consideration and at the same time to put all powers on the same footing, by complying with the rules of neutrality, this section 1, article 3, was framed and adopted.

Thus it will be seen that Mr. Hay repeated the views which he had expressed in his letter to Mr. White, as well as emphasizing again the American doctrine in behalf of which I have offered plenary and incontrovertible proof. In this memorandum the policy of the United States is again reaffirmed; the interpretation of neutralization in the treaty is clearly set forth. This interpretation declares that the canal is built "for the equal benefit of all nations," and that in consideration of the abandonment of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is submitted with the view of putting "all powers on the same footing," and that this equality of footing is to be accomplished "by complying with the rules of neutrality," and for this purpose section 1, article 3, was adopted.

But I now turn to the agreement itself, the preamble of which substantially states that Great Britain rescinds the Clayton-Bulwer treaty on condition that the canal to be constructed under the terms of the new contract—the Hay-Pauncefote treaty—shall not impair "the 'general principle' of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention," the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

This significant article is as follows:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired in entering into this convention to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the Isthmus which connects North and South America; and especially to the inter-oceanic communications—should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway—which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

This article is not only made a part of the preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, but it expresses the general intent, design, and policy of this treaty.

This general intent, the "great design," I repeat, is that "it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that" there shall be "no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon [the canal] than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that" the canal shall "be open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms."

In other words, equality of "charges or conditions of traffic" carried by the vessels of all nations through the canal is the very life of this article and of this treaty of which the article is a part. So in the preamble of this agreement we find Great Britain's plain reservation of equality of charges or conditions as respects her traffic. Indeed, I repeat that if Great Britain is not accorded the same charges upon her traffic which we accord to our traffic, she has given up all of her rights and benefits under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and has received no right or benefit in return. She has sold everything and has received nothing therefor. She has gone through the idle performance of making a new contract which acquires nothing that she could not have obtained by a simple annulment of the old contract. What sane man thinks she was so stupid or that America would have so tricked her!

I pass over articles 1 and 2, save to say that in the latter the United States secures the exclusive right to construct, directly or indirectly, the canal, and to regulate and control it; but all of these rights are subject to the preamble and all the articles of this treaty. The treaty must be read as a whole.

Mr. Speaker, I now come to article 3, the storm center of this controversy. It is only necessary, however, to consider the first three paragraphs of this section, which read as follows:

The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

The words just read, "all nations," are construed by the opponents of this repeal to mean all nations except the United States. It is apparent that this is an arbitrary exception, a bald subterfuge, based upon the valor of prejudice and the hysteria of jingoism.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], in quoting this section, used the word "other," so as to make the language read "all other nations." He was frank and logical in reading this word into the agreement, for unless this or some similar word be added to qualify the words "all nations" the United States must have a place in the family of nations. But we must construe the words as they are and not as we would have them. And we should construe them judicially and not with the refinement of special pleaders.

Mr. Speaker, I first submit that this treaty is a commercial agreement. The preamble and this article alone demonstrate this construction, to say nothing of the residue of the treaty. I next submit that this preamble and article do not so much neutralize the canal as they neutralize the traffic passing through the canal, and the neutralization of traffic can be accomplished in no other way than to impose thereupon the same charges and conditions. We are dealing incidentally with nations at the canal, but we are dealing primarily and specifically with the traffic of the subjects or citizens of nations when passing through the canal. It is the traffic we regulate; it is the traffic for which we charge. Such is the plain meaning of article 8 in the preamble and of article 3, the most pertinent portions of which I have just read.

I beg the attention of the House for a few minutes that I may make a closer analysis of this article. In the first place, the United States "adopts," by and with the consent of Great Britain, certain rules for the "neutralization" of the Panama Canal, which rules are mainly taken from the treaty of the Suez Canal. It is argued that the United States prescribes these rules. Nothing is further from the fact. The United States alone prescribes no rules; but she subscribes to certain rules jointly agreed upon by herself and Great Britain. The word "adopts" does not mean that the United States is exempt from the rules. It means she must conform to and obey these rules, which she and Great Britain have agreed upon. The word "adopts" has no doubtful meaning in our policy or jurisprudence. We adopt resolutions; we adopt constitutions; and when we do, we are bound by such resolutions or constitutions. I repeat, these rules are not the rules of either the United States or of Great Britain. They are the rules embodied in a treaty signed by both nations, and they are the rules to be applied to the traffic and commerce of all nations.

We should also call to mind at this point that these rules are mainly the rules of neutrality for the Suez Canal promulgated in the treaty of Constantinople on October 22, 1888, and that in the application of these rules to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the great Davis report insists that—

The United States can not take an attitude of opposition to the principles of the great act of October 22, 1888 [the Constantinople treaty], without discrediting the official declarations of our Government for 50 years on the neutrality of the Isthmian Canal and its equal use by all nations without discrimination.

Again, Mr. Speaker, the first 26 words of section 1, article 3, pronounce a policy of "entire equality." This is the declaratory purpose of this paragraph, and the remainder of it undertakes to effectuate this equality. In other words, the equality of treatment must be so exercised and practised—

That there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

That is to say, the evident meaning of this section is that the equality of charges and conditions must be made "so that," or as a result that, these conditions or charges shall not be discriminatory. The mandate against discrimination is the very genius of this article. We may exempt our coastwise trade from tolls; but if so, we must likewise exempt the coastwise vessels of Great Britain. A vessel of a United States citizen going from a seaport in Maine down through the canal and up to Seattle is no more a coastwise vessel than a vessel of Great Britain going from Halifax through the canal to Vancouver. If we charge one, we must charge the other; if we exempt one, we must exempt the other; otherwise there is discrimination.

It is urged, however, that the words "observing these rules" exempts the commerce of the United States, as she only prescribes rules to be observed by other nations, and it was not contemplated that she should observe these rules herself. This construction is likewise arbitrary, for the rules to be observed are those agreed upon conjointly by the United States and Great Britain, and these rules were intended to be observed "by the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations"—other than the Government vessels of the United States and Panama—"on terms of entire equality."

It is well to remember also, Mr. Speaker, that when this treaty was made the United States had no territorial sovereignty in Panama. Great Britain and our country were agreeing to rules to be applied to traffic passing through a canal to be located in some territory unacquired at that time by the United States. But should such territory be subsequently obtained, the meaning of the rules was not to be changed, because in article 4 of the treaty it is specifically agreed that—

No change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

In other words, the treaty was made in full realization by Great Britain and the United States of the existing sovereignty of Colombia in Central America, but out of abundant caution this particular article was inserted in order that the general agreement should be unaffected even though there should be a subsequent change of territorial sovereignty. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that when this treaty was made the United States did not own Panama and had no more territorial rights in Panama or Central America than Great Britain.

The hypercriticism of this treaty seeks to exclude the United States from the agreement on the ground that the vessels of war of the United States and of Panama are exempt from tolls. The contention, in other words, is that if we have a right to exempt the vessels of war we have the right to exempt the vessels of commerce. This confusion, however, exists because we do not make a plain distinction between the vessels of war which belong to the United States as a governmental or corporate entity and the vessels of commerce, which do not belong to the United States at all, but belong only to her citizens. So the payment of tolls upon vessels of commerce will be paid by the citizens of the United States; while, on the other hand, the tolls upon vessels of war of the United States is a payment made by the Government and not by citizens, and cotemporaneously made and received by the Government itself. Therefore, to require the United States ships of war to pay tolls is to require a useless and vain performance—to pay down and receive back at the same time by the same hand. But the British Government officially disclaims such a construction of the treaty.

This Government admits that we have a right to exempt our war vessels by reason both of the impotency and ineffectiveness of the toll and by the express right of the United States to protect the canal.

But the right possessed by Panama is found in article 19 of her treaty with the United States, made November 18, 1903, and is in the following words:

> The Government of the Republic of Panama shall have the right to transport over the canal its vessels, its troops, and munitions of war in such vessels at all times without paying charges of any kind.

It is thus obvious from this section that the right of Panama to transport her Government vessels is not derived from the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, but is a right reserved by Panama in her treaty with the United States. In other words, Panama sold the exclusive right to construct a canal across her territory, but upon the express condition and as a part of the consideration of sale that she reserved the right to transport her Government ships through the canal. That is to say, the United States took the territory subject to this right which Great Britain must respect because it in nowise infringes upon any of her treaty rights.

THE CANAL THE PROPERTY OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. Speaker, I will briefly direct the attention of the House to the treaty made by the United States with Panama, and to which I have just alluded. It should be observed that Panama herself requires the United States to construct, operate, and maintain the canal in accordance with the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. This is expressed in article 18, which explicitly declares that the canal, when acquired by the United States—> shall be opened upon the terms provided for in section 1 of article 3 of, and in conformity with all the stipulations of, the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901.

So it is manifest that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and the Panama treaty must be considered together in order to determine the several rights of the three nations in this canal.

It is also argued that the Panama treaty grants to the United States territorial sovereignty in fee simple. This contention is unfounded. I venture that no impartial tribunal would hold that the United States has acquired anything other than a use in perpetuity for the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal in conformity with the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and certain reservations made in the Panama treaty. Therefore I submit that the United States acquires the canal not only in conformity with the treaties which I have just mentioned, but in conformity with the great American doctrine, frequently called the "great principle" or the "great design."

The United States has a franchise or an easement from Panama, and in the conduct of the business of maintaining and operating the canal the United States must be regarded as an individual or corporation. When a Government undertakes to do a private business, she is as to that business as any other private owner. This is an accepted doctrine and suggests this inquiry: What private corporation operating this canal under these treaties could lawfully discriminate among the vessels of commerce using the canal?

THE BARD AMENDMENT.

Mr. Speaker, the advocates of repeal do not have to wander afield for a direct interpretation as to whether coastwise vessels of the United States are excluded by the terms of this treaty. When the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty was considered by the Senate (and the particular article and language now considered were substantially the same in both treaties), Senator Bard moved the Senate, on December 13, 1900, to adopt the following amendment:

> ART. 3. The United States reserves the right, in the regulation and management of the canal, to discriminate in respect of the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade.

This amendment covered the precise question we are now considering. It was offered for no other purpose than to exempt coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls, and it would not, of course, have been offered if such vessels were already exempt under the treaty, as now contended. The amendment received 27 ayes to 43 nays, thus rejecting the amendment and thereby plainly and affirmatively declaring that coastwise vessels of the citizens of the United States should not be exempt from tolls. Nothing is clearer under our system of laws, under our canons of construction, than that this rejection of the amendment determined the Senate's interpretation of the treaty against the exemption in question.

But, Mr. Speaker, we are asked to overturn the rational and legal effect incident to the rejection of this amendment by the impotent contention that the amendment only meant what the treaty said, and it was, therefore, unnecessary. Of course no American court would adopt such a principle of construction; but I go farther and aver that even this can not be shown. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] has marshaled proof to the contrary, and I submit in this connection an extract from a speech of the Hon. Charles W. Fairbanks, delivered in St. Louis on May 1, 1913, at the Fourth American Peace Congress:

> When the treaty was before the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate this question was debated, and when the treaty came into the Senate and was open for amendment Senator Bard, of California, introduced a proposed amendment to the treaty which provided expressly that the United States reserves the right to grant preferential treatment to her coastwise trade. And what was the result of the amendment? He supported it in an argument of great power. I heard him. He exhaustively considered all of the views presented now in opposition to the present interpretation of the treaty as I have given it to you. He presented all of the considerations which could be marshaled in support of or favorable to the United States preferential treatment. But his amendment was voted down, and decisively voted down. I heard it said recently by men of eminence that the reason the treaty amendment was voted down was that it was surplusage, that the treaty as it is meant it anyhow. No; that is not correct. The amendment was voted down then because in the opinion of a vast majority of the Senate of the United States it was violative of the spirit of equality which had been expressed in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and carried into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. That is why it was voted down.

THE WELLAND CANAL.

The construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty for which I have contended is not only sustained upon the grounds that I have stated, but upon the expressed interpretation of the United States of a similar clause in the treaty of 1871 between herself and Great Britain. Under this treaty Great Britain undertook to give a rebate of 18 cents on a charge of 20 cents per ton on certain freight carried through the Welland and other canals to Montreal and points farther east. This rebate resulted in a payment of 2 cents per ton by Great Britain, as against 20 cents by the United States. We objected to such discrimination on the ground that it violated the provision guaranteeing to the citizens of the United States "the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion."

In other words, the exemption which is now asked for the commerce of the United States in the Panama Canal was objected to by the United States when practiced by Great Britain in the Welland Canal. The amount of traffic passing through these northern canals is some 40,000,000 tons, a volume so large as to render insignificant the most exaggerated tonnage of the Panama Canal. Of course, if we apply the exemption in Panama, we may expect Great Britain to practise the exemption in the northern canals. The opportunity for reprisals and retaliations on the part of Great Britain are infinitely greater than any that we could possibly secure for the ships of our citizens in the use of the Panama Canal. So the construction which is asked to be given to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty not only violates our construction of similar words in the treaty of 1871 as respects the Welland Canal, but will subject our people to an immeasurable loss.

THE AMERICAN POLICY.

Mr. Speaker, it is argued with more vehemence than verity that the tolls exemption is an American doctrine, and this despite the fact that the utterances and practice of our Government have been to the contrary. The very thoughts and processes forming the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, as I have shown, demonstrate that the policy of our Government from Clay's letter in 1826 to this hour is adverse to preferential advantages for our own commerce through the Isthmian Canal. We have always asserted that the canal was to be for the use of mankind. In view of this often-expressed policy, Secretary Cass declared that Central America had no right to bar the nations of the world from the right of passage across the Isthmus.

Mr. Cleveland, in his annual message of 1885, said that the wisdom and practice of former administrations in respect to an interoceanic canal had—consecrated it in advance to the common use of mankind by their positive declarations and through the formal obligations of treaties.

And President Roosevelt, in his message to Congress on January 4, 1904, in relation to the acquisition of the Canal Zone from Panama, declared:

If ever a Government could be said to have received a mandate from civilization to effect an object the accomplishment of which was demanded in the interest of mankind, the United States holds that position with regard to the interoceanic canal.

So those who support this repeal find an unbroken line of precedents and practices which sustain their views and votes for the repeal of this bill, which is but another expression of the long-sustained American policy.

Mr. Speaker, I am not willing to follow the un-American doctrine urged upon this House by the opponents of this bill. I have never doubted that the act we now seek to repeal not only violates the American policy expressed over and over again by the most masterful figures in our diplomacy, but that this act plainly conflicts with our existing contract with Great Britain known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I have so declared myself before becoming a Member of this House, and I find that my responsibility as a Representative of a great constituency deepens and strengthens this conviction.

THE HONOR OF THE NATION.

Mr. Speaker, the infidelity of individuals to their contracts soon passes into the limbo of the lost, but the infidelity of nations to their agreements is an everlasting shame. Nations must move upon a higher plane than individuals. States possess what Cicero calls an eternity, and we must so legislate that our deeds will stand the tests of time.

I do not impugn the good faith of anyone who differs with me. I am opposed to a statute which compels commercial reprisals and international distrust. England is not alone concerned in this canal. This act provokes at once the hostility of Central and South America as well as the great commercial nations of the world. Our Government invites suspicion from every foreign chancellery. It is true England alone can protest, for she alone is a party to the treaty. But she is also the mandatory of nations, and it requires no imagination to realize that these nations are pouring their complaints into her ears.

Our national pride and national sufficiency are virtues in their places, but these virtues should not be employed to make the poor and weak of our land pay for the privileges of the rich and strong. These virtues should not subject our standards of conscience to the derision of mankind, a decent respect for whose opinions the Declaration of Independence early proclaimed as one of the standards of civilization.

So in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I decline to be swerved from my duty by the hysterical declamation about "cringing" to Great Britain. These criticisms are mere balderdash. We who favor this repeal cringe to no nation of the earth. We love our country with a passionate devotion. But we yield obedience to her solemn contracts, believing that their faithful observance enhances the dignity and stability, the honor and glory of our Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I voted against the provision of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, which exempts coastwise vessels of the United States from the payment of tolls. My attitude on that question was based almost entirely on consideration of its economic aspects. I have the advantage of many distinguished gentlemen in that I have not changed my mind. I did not subscribe to a platform or make campaign speeches before applauding audiences, lauding the policy of free tolls, only to be persuaded by Executive pleading and a lively appreciation of the fruitful "plum tree" that I had been mistaken. I still believe that, economically, the free-tolls policy is unwise, and I am still of the opinion that there is ground for difference of view as to whether relieving American coastwise ships from payment of tolls conflicts with our treaty obligations.

But, Mr. Speaker, the proposition now before us, the questions we are called to pass upon are of much greater importance, of vastly larger moment than any economic policy relative to the use of the Panama Canal. [Applause.] They are of infinitely broader and wider import than any mere controverted question as to the proper interpretation of the treaty with Great Britain affecting the canal. [Applause.]

With me the question of economic policies, and the still broader question of treaty interpretation in the enactment of legislation, is completely overshadowed by the weightier question as to whether national policies written into law are to be overturned at the behest of the Executive, unaccompanied and unsupported by substantial fact or effective argument. These questions relating to the canal cease to be of present moment in the presence of the all-important questions as to whether our foreign policies are to be shaped, warped, and overturned in obedience to every demand wafted to us from over the seas; as to whether we have reached that pass in our international dealings where it becomes necessary to yield to foreign threats or accept foreign interpretation of treaties. [Applause.] This is the issue as now joined, this the surrender demanded on a plea of helping out and bolstering up of a vain, weak, and pusillanimous foreign policy touching and affecting matters entirely remote from and unassociated with the questions on which we are asked to surrender.

The President pleads with this Congress to reverse the action of the last Congress on the Panama tolls question. He asks the architects of the Democratic platform to volunteer as a wrecking crew to tear it down. [Applause.] The President and his party having secured the benefits of free tolls as a campaign slogan, as evidenced by their majority here, now bids us to repudiate their former utterances as a personal favor to him.

He urges repeal on the ground that the exemption constituted a mistaken economic policy, but he advances no arguments in support of that contention, and therefore leaves us just where we were before in that regard. He evidently considered the economic questions involved relatively unimportant factors and features of the situation, and so assigned them to the minor and unimportant rôle which they now occupy.

When the President, in his recommendation for repeal, approached the question of treaty obligations, he did not leave us altogether in the dark as to his process of reasoning. He argued that, having sought and agreed to a treaty, having legislated on matters involved therein, and the other party having protested our action, "we ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong."

At one time and another in the world's history some very remarkable statements have been made and theories advanced relative to treaty rights and obligations, but I venture the assertion that never before has so remarkable a proposal as this been seriously advanced by the responsible head of a great nation.

This declaration on the part of the President is so extraordinary, it proposes and suggests a policy relative to the interpretation of the treaties so clearly subversive of every sound principle of international relations, so utterly destructive, if followed to its logical conclusion, of every treaty right which any designing, bullying, or domineering foreign power might question, that in the presence of the issue thus raised the question of tolls, or of the interpretation of this particular treaty, sinks into utter insignificance. [Applause.]

The President's idea seems to be that in order to secure a "reputation for generosity" we should shift, bend, and double back on national policies; modify, revise, amend, and repeal our legislation on demand or request. We ought particularly to do it, argues the President, to suit the passing whim and fancy of any foreign prince or potentate who may seek to enliven his dull moments by pulling the string to see the American Government and Congress bob up and down and all around like a painted monkey on a wooden stick. [Applause.]

As though there were not enough in the issues which the President raises, with regard to treaties, to compel every self-respecting Member to vote against this repeal, the President furnishes the final and unanswerable argument against it in the last paragraph of his message, in which he asks us to repeal the free-tolls provision in support of the foreign policy of his administration. In support of what foreign policy of the administration, pray? Can anyone think of any foreign policy of the administration that ought to be supported? [Applause.] If so, I should like to know what it is. I pause for a reply.

Is it the policy of retreat in China we are asked to support? A policy under which we have jeopardized, if we have not already lost, in 12 months, a mutually helpful and advantageous influence we have been a generation in acquiring. Is it the policy of nosing around in the domestic affairs of the West India Islands that is to be upheld or the policy of intermeddling in Nicaragua? Perhaps it is the administration's lack of policy with Japan that we are to support. An attitude of wabble which has quite naturally left a sensitive and cocky, but really friendly, people wondering where we stand and what our intentions really are.

I propound these queries, with regard to what feature of the administration's foreign policy the President wants supported, for the very good reason that he has left us entirely in the dark in regard to the matter. For all we know, the President may, in anticipation of the development of his policy, be already thinking of the Philippines as foreign territory, and asking us to support his policy of scoot and scuttle there.

The last sentence of the message, however, may throw some light on what the President had in mind when he asked us to support the foreign policy of the administration. In that final and personal appeal he said:

> I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it [that is, the repeal] to me in ungrudging measure.

Greater delicacy, nearer consequence—there we have it! That spells Mexico; and the President calls upon us to support an announced policy of complete surrender, now and hereafter, of every treaty right which may be challenged or contested in support of a policy in Mexico of utter neglect of treaty obligations, of open aid and encouragement of rapine and revolution. He asks us to support a policy which has prolonged and extended the reign of barbarism, isolated us from the opportunity of protecting the life and property of our citizens and those of other lands whose right to protect themselves we have denied—a policy which has lowered our prestige in all Latin America and made us the laughingstock of the world.

Mr. Speaker, I have not changed my mind with regard to the economic policy involved in this issue; but that policy sinks into utter insignificance in the presence of the mighty issues the President has raised. To these issues there can, in my opinion, be but one answer. I decline to support, and thus aid in the establishment of, a policy of wabble on national and international questions. I decline to give adherence to a policy of apology and surrender on demand to every Government, great or small, with which we may have controversies. [Applause.] Over and above all, I decline to do these things in support of a foreign policy, which, to put it mildly and politely as I can, is, in my opinion, the most unfortunate and indefensible in all American history. [Applause.]

The President came to my way of thinking in the matter of tolls, but he did it under conditions not creditable to him or us. He proposes repeal of toll exemptions for reasons untenable and indefensible. The situation thus presented, the issues thus joined, makes it the duty of every Member who is proud of American achievement, insistent on American rights, jealous of American honor, and determined to uphold American dignity to vote against this repeal. [Applause.]

During the course of this debate gentlemen favorable to this surrender have propounded the extraordinary question, "Under what flag will you fight?" I leave it to you gentlemen to decide under what foreign flag you make your surrender. I leave it to your constituents to decide whether you are justified in raising the presidential flag, embroidered with the emblem of the faithful plum tree, above the platform and standards of your great party. [Applause.] And as for those of us who fight against this repeal, while we follow the guidons of the real leaders of the three parties in this Nation, we fight under the only flag under which any American can fight in defense of his country's rights, its honor, its dignity, its standing in the world—those glorious folds, Mr. Speaker, which float above your chair. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma). The gentleman lacked three minutes of consuming all of his time.

Mr. MONDELL. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON]. [Applause.]

THE CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY AND ARTICLE 8.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, in 1850, by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the United States and Great Britain jointly agreed to protect any canal or railway that might be constructed across the Isthmus connecting North and South America, and they declared that neither nation would ever obtain or maintain for itself exclusive control over any such canal, nor "maintain any fortifications commanding the same," nor exercise dominion over "any part of Central America," nor use any intimacy, alliance, connection, or influence that either might possess with any State or Government through which the canal might pass, to acquire or hold for the citizens or subjects of the one any rights or advantages of commerce or navigation through the canal which should not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other.

They further agreed in article 8 that, "having not only desired to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle," they extended their joint protection over any canal or railway that might be built, but they declared that they did this upon the condition that no other charges or conditions of traffic should be imposed than they themselves should approve of as just and equitable; and they declared that they did this upon the further condition that such canal or railway "being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of any other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford."

THE PRINCIPLE OF NEUTRALIZATION.

In 1901, "to remove any objection that might arise out of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty" to the construction of the canal under the auspices of the United States alone, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was superseded by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, but it was expressly agreed that the general principle of neutralization established by article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty should not be impaired.

What is this "general principle of neutralization"? In article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty the contracting nations extended their joint protection to whatever canal or railroad might be built upon two specific conditions, viz:

First. That no other charges or conditions of traffic should be imposed than the United States and Great Britain should approve of as just and equitable.

Second. That the canal, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, it should also be open "on like terms to the citizens and subjects of all other nations willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford."

But the object of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty being to eliminate Great Britain from any control over the canal, and to relieve her from any responsibility of protecting the canal, nothing was left of the "principle of neutralization" established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and renewed in the preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty except the agreement for "equal terms," and the Government of the United States agreed to those terms and undertook to build the canal on those terms.

The purpose of the contracting Governments is declared in the preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to be, first, to "facilitate the construction of a ship canal," and, second, "to that end to remove any objection which might arise out of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty" to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the United States; but in declaring that the canal should be built under the auspices of the United States they stipulated that it should be so built without impairing the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of the treaty.

Therefore the treaty does not say that in constructing and operating the canal the United States may acquire or hold for its citizens rights or advantages in respect to tolls or traffic not offered on equal terms to the subjects of Great Britain or other nations.

It does not say that in constructing and operating the canal the United States may grant to some of its citizens or corporations, or to all of its citizens or corporations, rights or advantages in respect to tolls and traffic not offered to the citizens, subjects, and corporations of other nations.

CLAUSE 1 OF ARTICLE 3.

It does not say nor intimate any of these things, but it plainly says, in clause 1 of article 3:

> That the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions and charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

In this provision—Great Britain having been eliminated by the treaty of 1901 from any responsibility of protection or control of the canal—is expressed the remaining element of the principle of neutralization described in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and carried forward into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Let us examine it.

First, it provides that the canal shall be free and open to two kinds of vessels—viz, vessels of commerce and vessels of war of all nations, observing these rules, on terms of entire equality; and, second, it provides that "such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable."

(a) By "these rules" is meant six rules set forth in the treaty, of which the section quoted is the first.

(b) Vessels of commerce are vessels owned by the citizens or subjects of nations.

(c) Vessels of war are vessels owned by the nations themselves.

(d) The words "terms of entire equality" speak for themselves, but their purpose is made specific by the words "so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise."

These words are broad and sweeping in their purpose. No discrimination is to be made against any nation "observing these rules" and no discrimination is to be made against the "citizens or subjects" of any nation observing these rules, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

Who are the nations "observing these rules"?

First and foremost certainly among the nations "observing these rules" must be held to be the nations making and agreeing to them, unless they themselves expressly exempt themselves, but article 3 makes "these rules" specifically binding upon the United States by saying "The United States adopts as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules," and then sets them out at length.

Our Government still further bound itself by these rules and estopped itself to deny their binding force by its treaty with Panama in 1903, in which it agreed that—

> The canal, when constructed * * * shall be neutral in perpetuity and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by section 1 of article 3, of and in conformity with all the stipulations of the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901. (Art. 18.)

ARTICLE 2.

Article 2 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty declares that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States in one of three ways:

(1) Either directly or indirectly at its own cost, or (2) by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or (3) through subscription to or purchase of stock on shares.

Suppose now that instead of constructing the canal itself "directly at its own cost," the United States had caused the canal to be dug by individuals or corporations, could it be contended that the United States, under our treaty, could grant to such individuals or corporations the power to give to other individuals or corporations rights or advantages in respect to tolls or traffic not offered to the subjects of Great Britain or to the citizens or subjects of other nations on equal terms?

If it be conceded that such rights or advantages could not be granted to individuals or corporations operating the canal, how, then, can it be said that the same treaty stipulation that denies to the Government of the United States the right to grant special rights or advantages to individuals or corporations at the same time grants an exception to the Government of the United States, when no such exception is expressed?

If the Government of the United States had permitted the construction of the canal by individuals or corporations instead of constructing it itself, is it likely it would have permitted such individuals or corporations, contrary to the spirit of its transportation laws, to discriminate against some of its citizens in favor of others of its citizens in the use of the canal?

If it be conceded that the Government would not permit such discrimination by individuals or corporations, by what process of reasoning can the Government justify itself in making such discrimination, contrary to the letter and spirit of its own laws?

If it be conceded that the spirit and letter of our commerce laws is that carrying corporations or individuals shall not discriminate in favor of some of the people against the rest of the people in freight and passenger rates, how then can it be said that the Government intended by a treaty with a foreign nation to override its own laws and grant to itself the right to confer special privileges upon some of its people at the expense of the rest of its people?

THE RIGHT TO DEFEND IN TIME OF WAR.

But some gentlemen say that by adopting the six rules set forth in clause 3 we have cut ourselves off from the right to defend our canal in time of war.

They say that when we admit ourselves to be bound by the first rule we admit ourselves to be bound by the other five rules, and they say that by adopting these rules we place ourselves in the same category with all other belligerents in time of war, and leave ourselves no right to protect our canal in time of war.

If the treaty had been open to that construction, it is not conceivable that the United States Senate would have confirmed it, and every patriotic American would have denounced it.

When gentlemen argue that we have deliberately bound ourselves not to protect our own property in time of war they impeach John Hay who negotiated the treaty, and the Senate of the United States which confirmed it, of incompetency.

Gentlemen draw pictures of the United States sitting idly by, bound hand and foot by its own contract, and watching hostile fleets approach our canal to destroy it.

They picture our Army and Navy standing by with loaded guns and helplessly watching hostile ships go through our own canal bent on the destruction of our coast cities.

Not only that; but since in time of peace it will be our custom to conduct ships through the canal to avoid injury to the canal by careless handling, their argument leads them to the conclusion that in time of war it will be our duty to courteously conduct our enemies through the canal.

But when gentlemen make this argument they forget the rule of international law which in time of war relegates belligerent nations to their natural right of self-defense.

They forget that article 3 was framed in full recognition by all nations of that principle, and they forget that Great Britain is on record as expressly recognizing that principle as governing this treaty.

Gentlemen will remember that there were two Hay-Pauncefote treaties, the first one dated February 5, 1900, which was not ratified, the other dated November 18, 1901.

By the first line of article 2 of the first treaty the United States and Great Britain adopted these rules as the basis of the neutralization of the canal, but by the first line of article 3 of the second treaty the United States alone adopts these rules.

In the first line of the first section of article 2 of the first treaty the words "in time of war as in time of peace" were incorporated, so that the section read "the canal shall be free and open in time of war as in time of peace to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations on terms of entire equality," but these words "in time of war as in time of peace" were stricken out of the second treaty, and were stricken out for the very purpose of preserving our right to defend the canal.

In a statement concerning these amendments prepared by the State Department and sent to the Senate by John Hay, Secretary of State, this explanation is given of these changes:

> No longer insisting upon the language of the Davis amendment—which had in terms reserved to the United States express permission to disregard the rules of neutrality prescribed when necessary to secure its own defense, which the Senate had apparently deemed necessary because of the provision in rule 1 that the canal should be free and open "in time of war as in time of peace" to the vessels of all nations—it was considered that the omission of the words "in time of war as in time of peace" would dispense with the necessity of the amendment referred to and that war between the contracting parties or between the United States and any other power would have the ordinary effect of war upon treaties when not specially otherwise provided, and would remit both parties to their original and natural right of self-defense and give to the United States the clear right to close the canal against the other belligerent and to protect it and defend itself by whatever means might be necessary. (S. Doc. No. 746, 61st Cong., 3d sess.)

This is confirmed by the note of the Secretary of State of Foreign Affairs of Great Britain to Ambassador Bryce under date November 14, 1912, in which he says:

> The British Government "have recognized in the fullest manner the right of the United States to control the canal" and "do not question its title to exercise belligerent rights for its protection."

IN TIME OF PEACE.

But gentlemen say that under the treaty we must pay tolls on our warships in time of peace.

But the British Government "have recognized in the fullest manner the right of the United States to control the canal," and say "it certainly was not the intention of His Majesty's Government that any responsibility for the protection of the canal should attach to them in the future.".

And the British Government does not question our right to protect the canal in time of peace as in time of war. Mr. Knox, in his reply to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of Great Britain, said:

> Great Britain does not challenge the right of the United States to protect the canal. United States vessels of war and those employed in the Government service are a part of our own protective system. By the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we assume the sole responsibility for its neutralization. It is inconceivable that this Government should be required to pay tolls for the vessels used for protecting the canal, which we alone must protect.
> The movement of the United States vessels in executing governmental policies of protection are not susceptible of explanation or differentiation.
> The United States could not be called upon to explain what relation the movement of a particular vessel through the canal has to its protection.

Besides, it would be absurd for the Government of the United States to require itself to take money out of its Treasury to pay tolls to itself on its ships moving backward and forward through the canal, and then immediately put it back again.

THE RIGHT TO FORTIFY.

Attention has been called to the fact that there is no affirmative declaration in the treaty of the understanding between the contracting nations that the United States as owner of the canal has the right to fortify the canal.

A provision was inserted in clause 7 of article 2 of the first treaty that "no fortifications shall be erected commanding the canal or the waters adjacent"; but these words were omitted from the second treaty on the ground, as explained by the State Department in the statement sent to the Senate by Mr. Hay, to which I have referred, that it was the understanding between the United States and Great Britain that "when constructed it"—the canal—"is to be exclusively the property of the United States and is to be managed, controlled, and defended by it," and the right of the United States to fortify the canal is unquestioned.

SUBSIDY.

Gentlemen quote Mr. Taft as approving, by his signature to the Panama Canal act, the theory that the United States "may do as it pleases with its own canal," but this does not define Mr. Taft's position.

He defined his position in his recent speech at Ottawa, Canada, in these words:

The tolls have been fixed on the canal for all the world on the assumption that the coastwise traffic is to pay tolls. Our giving it immunity from tolls does not, in our judgment, affect the traffic of other countries in any other way than it would affect it if we had voted a subsidy equal to the tolls remitted to our ships.

No country is affected by our coastwise traffic except Canada, and if Canada is affected that way, she, too, can subsidize her trade from

But we did not vote a subsidy to coastwise vessels. There is no man here who would have the hardihood to vote to tax all the people to raise money to pay a direct subsidy to the coastwise carrying corporations.

Under the laws of the United States vessels constructed, owned, and operated by American citizens are given a monopoly of our coastwise trade.

Other vessels are prohibited from engaging in coastwise trade or in any part of it. (Rev. Stat., 4347.)

Therefore the coastwise-carrying corporations have an absolute monopoly of all the coastwise business, and the farmers of the country, already singled out by the last tariff bill for special assessment for the supposed benefit of the rest of mankind, will scarcely acquiesce in a policy that would tax them still further to pay a subsidy to an already prosperous monopoly.

There is no man here who would dare to propose to tax the people to pay a direct subsidy to a monopoly, but it is proposed by the advocates of free tolls to evade the appearance of a subsidy by a direct gift out of the Treasury of the United States to this same monopoly.

Public attention can not be diverted by waving the flag, from the obvious fact that when you deprive the Government of revenue with which to run the canal and give it to a monopoly you force the people to make up the difference by taxing themselves.

Mr. Taft says, in effect, that if we tax our people to grant a subsidy to a monopoly, Canada can also tax her people to pay a subsidy; but this very statement is an admission that toll exemption is a violation of our treaty.

Is it not discrimination against the citizens of a nation to compel them to tax themselves in order to put themselves on terms of equality with us in respect to tolls?

Is not a law which exempts some of the citizens of the United States from paying tolls and compels other nations to tax their citizens and subjects to raise money to pay tolls for some of its citizens or subjects discrimination against the citizens and subjects of such nations?

TOLLS AND FREIGHTS.

But aside from the international questions involved, the question of tolls involves the question of freights, and the question of freights involves the transportation interests of the people, and the manufacturers, producers, and consumers of the Middle West will scarcely look with equanimity upon a policy that discriminates in favor of both coasts of the country against the middle of the country.

Dr. Emory R. Johnson was recommended to the Secretary of War as special commissioner on Panama traffic and tolls by Col. George W. Goethals, Corps of Engineers of the United States Army, chairman and chief engineer of the Isthmian Canal Commission, governor of the Canal Zone, and president of the Panama Canal Railroad Co.

Of Dr. Johnson, Col. Goethals, in his testimony before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, volume 1, page 410, says:

I suggested Dr. Emory R. Johnson as a suitable man because of his profession and because of the study that he had already given to the subject.

In his report on Panama Canal traffic and tolls Dr. Johnson says:

5. It is earnestly argued by those who favor relieving American shipping of Panama tolls that the policy should be adopted in order to give further aid to the American merchant marine. When subjected to analysis this argument loses force. Our shipping employed in the foreign trade needs assistance, but our coastwise marine has a monopoly of the coastwise trade and does not need further aid. In 1911 there were 3,537,750 tons of American ships enrolled for the domestic trade on the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific seaboards. The increase during the preceding decade had been 38 per cent. There is thus a relatively large and healthily increasing tonnage of coastwise shipping, and the opening of the Panama Canal will undoubtedly bring about a large addition to the coastwise fleet. Our coastwise marine is now given sufficient aid and protection by our navigation laws.—Page 199.

1. In managing the Panama Canal and in fixing tolls the usefulness of the waterway to commerce and industry should be given first consideration. The policy as regards tolls and revenue should not be allowed to limit the traffic usefulness of the waterway.

2. The Panama Canal should be made commercially self-supporting. Tolls based upon the value of the service rendered by the canal are justifiable. Those who use the waterway may justly be required to make some compensation for the benefits received. Tolls, not unduly restricting the commercial usefulness of the waterway, may be levied that will yield revenue enough to meet operation, maintenance, sanitation, government, annuity, and interest charges.

3. The same rate of toll should be charged upon American as upon foreign vessels, because—

(a) The omission or repayment of tolls on American shipping would be of assistance mainly to our coastwise shipping, which does not need aid and would be of but little help to American vessels engaged in the foreign trade.

(b) Such subsidies as are given the American merchant marine should be paid to vessels employed in our foreign trade; but the remission or repayment to vessel owners of Panama tolls on American ships in the foreign trade would be an ineffective subsidy that might invite retaliatory measures by foreign Governments.

(c) The exemption of coastwise shipping from Panama tolls would inure mainly to the benefit of the coastwise carriers and only partially to the benefit of shippers and consumers. Neither the rates of the steamship lines nor the charges of the rail carriers will be appreciably higher if tolls are charged on coastwise shipping than they will be if such shipping is relieved from the payment of tolls.

4. The United States should adhere to business principles in the management of the Panama Canal. The Government needs to guard its revenues carefully. Present demands on the general budget are heavy and are certain to be larger. Taxes must necessarily increase. Those who directly benefit from using the canal, rather than the general taxpayers, ought to pay the expenses of operating and carrying the Panama Canal commercially.

5. The tolls at Panama should be such as to enable the canal (a) to divert from the Straits of Magellan all the traffic of the Pacific coast of South America, (b) to prevent the use of the Cape of Good Hope route by the commerce between the Atlantic-Gulf coast of the United States and Australia, (c) to divert from the Suez Canal the trade between the eastern seaboard of the United States and the Orient east of Singapore, and (d) to compete with the Suez Canal for a portion of Europe's commerce with the Far East.—Page 201.

Therefore, free tolls is only another name for subsidy. No advocate of free tolls would dare to vote for a subsidy to this monopoly, so he calls it "free tolls." More than that, no man would dare to vote for free tolls to this monopoly if free tolls were presented as a separate proposition. But gentlemen wave the flag, and while the eyes of the people are fixed upon the flag they propose to take money out of the Treasury—money raised by taxing the people—to make up for this gift to a protected monopoly.

About 4,000,000 tons of freight are carried back and forth across the United States annually, and of that freight the Middle West furnishes a large proportion.

On each coast there is what is known as a competitive zone in which water-borne freight competes with rail-borne freight, and it is at least of doubtful policy for the Government to discriminate by special favors to special interests against some sections of our country in favor of other sections of our country by enlarging areas of trade for some parts of our country and limiting areas of trade for other parts of our country.

MICHIGAN, THE NORTHWEST, AND THE MIDDLE WEST.

There is another phase of this tolls question which is of special interest to the Middle West and Northwest, including my own State of Michigan.

Last year the Canadian "Soo" Canal carried nearly 38,000,000 tons of American freight. It carried more American freight than was carried by our own "Soo" Canal because it is a little deeper.

Last year the Welland Canal carried nearly a million tons of American freight.

But the new 30-foot "Soo" Canal will carry more freight and the new 30-foot Welland Canal will carry more freight, and Canada is preparing her locks at Welland and the "Soo" for through sea traffic from the Lakes to the Atlantic and has completed surveys for another 30-foot canal from the Lakes to the St. Lawrence, and Canada controls the mouth of the St. Lawrence, subject to the treaty of 1871.

If we discriminate against Canada, Canada will claim the right to discriminate against us; and if Canada discriminates against us, every bushel of grain shipped east from the Northwest through Canadian canals and waterways will carry its share of the burden of that discrimination.

As the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] said in his very able argument, Michigan is on the front line of commercial competition with Canada.

The last tariff bill has left our farmers unprotected, and I do not propose to vote for a policy that may further facilitate Canadian competition to their detriment.

When the unprotected farmer of the Middle West and the Northwest begins to count the cost to himself of free tolls to protected special interests, he may not coincide enthusiastically with his free-tolls Representatives.

THE OWNERSHIP AND CONTROL OF COASTWISE SHIPS.

Our coastwise shipping has doubled since 1890. It is now about five times as great as the tonnage of British shipping engaged in the coastwise trade of the United Kingdom.

It is greater than the total merchant marine engaged in the foreign and domestic commerce of either Germany, France, or Italy.

It is now one of the most successful of American industries, and its business and profits will be greatly increased by the building of the canal.

The coastwise business is divided into two parts, viz, the Atlantic and Gulf Coast trade and the Pacific Coast trade.

Concerning the Atlantic and Gulf coast lines, the committee appointed to investigate shipping combinations under House resolution 587 reports:

On this leading water highway of American commerce practically all the large regular steamship lines are either controlled by railroads or are subsidiaries of one of two large shipping consolidations—the Eastern Steamship Corporation and the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Lines.

Not only do the railroads and the two shipping consolidations dominate over nine-tenths of the tonnage, but it is significant that very few of the principal routes on our entire Atlantic and Gulf coasts are served by more than one regular steamship line. (P. 369.)

Concerning the Pacific coast trade the committee reports:

In the Pacific coast trade, including the intercoastal trade, where independent steamship lines make a more prominent showing than in either the Atlantic coast or Great Lakes trade, railroads and shipping consolidations represent a large proportion of the total tonnage.

The 15 lines operating in this trade represent, after excluding steamers engaged in the foreign trade, a total of 106 steamers of 350,512 gross tons. Three of these lines are owned by railroads and four by shipping consolidations, and represent a combined total of 68 steamers of 172,679 gross tons, or over 64 per cent of the total number of steamers for the 15 lines and over 49 per cent of the tonnage. (P. 405.)

As to the coastwise trade generally the committee reports:

Considering all the line services engaged in the coastwise and Great Lakes trade, the following totals appear: The lines number 60; the steamers operated strictly in the domestic trade, 474; and the gross tonnage of these steamers, 1,180,897 tons. Of these totals, 19 railroads control 209 steamers, 44.1 per cent of the total, and 589,561 gross tons, nearly 50 per cent of the total. Eleven lines belong to shipping consolidations and operate 121 steamers, 25.5 per cent of the total, of 279,180 gross tons, 23.6 per cent of the total.

All told, the 30 lines referred to as controlled by railroads or shipping consolidations operate 330 steamers of 868,741 gross tons, or nearly 70 per cent of the total number of steamers and 74 per cent of the tonnage. (P. 405.)

The canal will cost the people of the United States, for operation, maintenance, protection, and interest on investment, between twenty-five and thirty million dollars a year.

It will reduce freight rates from coast to coast from 25 to 50 per cent.

A toll rate fixed at $1.20 per net registered ton will amount to only 40 to 60 cents for a cargo ton, or from 2 to 3 cents a hundred pounds.

It is doubtful if any consumer would buy any commodity the fractional part of a cent cheaper by reason of free tolls to coastwise vessels, but it is not doubtful that if our enormous coastwise tonnage were permitted to go through free the American people would have to make up the loss of canal income by taxation.

SPECIAL FAVORS TO SPECIAL INTERESTS.

The exemption of coastwise vessels from payment of tolls incorporated in the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, is charged by other nations as being in violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and a breach of our agreement that the canal should be free and open to the other nations of the world "on terms of entire equality," and there is grave difference of opinion among our own people as to whether we have broken our treaty promises by the free-tolls provision.

On February 5, 1914, the President wrote a letter to Mr. William L. Marbury, of Baltimore, in which he said:

With regard to the question of canal tolls my opinion is very clear. The exemption constitutes a very mistaken policy from every point of view.

It is economically unjust. As a matter of fact, it benefits, for the present at any rate, only a monopoly, and it seems to me in clear violation of the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

There is, of course, much honest difference of opinion as to the last point, as there is no doubt as to the others; but it is at least debatable, and if the promises we make in such matters are debatable I, for one, do not care to debate them.

I think the country would prefer to let no question arise as to its whole-hearted purpose to redeem its promises in the light of any reasonable construction of them rather than debate a point of honor.

On March 5 the President came before Congress, and "with the utmost earnestness of which he is capable" asked for the repeal of the free-tolls provision, saying that no communication which he had addressed to Congress had carried with it "graver and more far-reaching implications as to the interests of the country," and closed with the declaration that he would not know "how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence" if his request were not granted in ungrudging measure.

When the President of the United States, acting under his responsibility as Chief Executive, comes before the Congress and the people with such a message, he presents a situation which challenges the nonpartisan attention of every patriotic American citizen, and demands from him the gravest care as to what he does in relation to this bill.

My record is clear. I voted against the free-tolls provision when it was offered as an amendment to the canal act of 1912. I shall vote to strike it out now, because I do not believe we are at liberty to exempt coastwise corporations from paying tolls under our treaty and because I do not believe it would be good business policy to do so and because I do not believe it would be fair to our own people to tax them for the purpose of extending special favors to special interests.

This is not a matter of party politics, but to Republicans, to Democrats, and to Progressives it ought to be sufficient to remind them that all have declared themselves to be opposed to monopolies; and to Democrats and Progressives it ought to be sufficient to remind them that notwithstanding their party platforms a high principle is involved here which will not permit us to dicker with our national honor in order to give favors to special interests.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, this country has spent nearly $400,000,000 in building the Panama Canal. It will have cost us over four hundred millions when completed and fortified. This cost comes out of the pockets of the taxpayers of the country.

Those favoring "free tolls" lay great stress upon the argument that "this is our canal, and therefore our ships should go through it free of charge." It is true the canal is "ours," but the weakness of their argument lies in the fact that the ships are not "ours." The canal belongs to the people; they have paid dearly for it; but the ships belong to the "trusts" and large corporations.

Under the canal act of August 24, 1912, American ships are exempted from the payment of tolls. Tolls are exacted from all other ships using the canal. Of course, tolls should not and will not be charged upon ships owned by the United States Government.

The canal has cost an immense sum and will continue to cost a great deal for its upkeep and maintenance. I fail to see any justice in taxing the people to build a canal and then turn it over free of cost to the Ship Trust, which is one of the most gigantic trusts of this country. We should at least require these great corporations to pay a reasonable toll for the use of the canal, in order that the canal will be somewhat self-sustaining, and in order that a great burden may be lifted from the shoulders of the American taxpayers. The people have paid tribute enough to the railroad-owned ships of this country in paying for the building of the canal. There should be something coming back, and the way to get at it is to charge tolls for the use of the canal.

The Panama Canal is the greatest engineering accomplishment of the age, and is an enduring monument to American brain and progress. It links the Pacific to the Atlantic Ocean by an inland route of 42 miles in length and effects a saving of thousands of miles to ships going from one ocean to the other. It is a possession of which every loyal American should be justly proud and challenges the admiration of the rest of the world. It materially adds to our country's supremacy as a world power.

The question soon to be voted upon in the House is whether or not the canal is to be left "toll free" for American vessels. Everybody agrees that foreign vessels should be charged tolls.

We are urged to permit "America's great canal to be used by American ships free of tolls." These gentlemen, I am sure, are sincere, but being intelligent men they know such a policy can mean nothing less than a "subsidy" to American ships. They would under the parade of patriotism extend this subsidy to the "shipping trust" on the argument of "our ships should not be charged tolls upon our own canal," which would amount to fully $5,000,000 per annum, when they would not dare vote for a straight "subsidy" of one cent to be paid directly and openly as a "subsidy" out of the Treasury. They are willing to do by "indirection" what they would not dare do by "direction." The canal is ours; we are entitled to the revenues and returns arising from its use, which will help pay the expense of operation.

If "free tolls" to the American ships meant cheaper freight rates to the American people, there would be more consistency in the argument, but we know from experience that the great corporations will get together upon rates and the people will not get the benefit. To give the trusts "free tolls" simply means to swell the already large dividends of these gigantic companies, the stock of which is in many instances owned by foreign financiers and capitalists. For me, I prefer to legislate in the interest of the people instead of in the interest of the trusts. I prefer to stand by the masses instead of the classes.

The Democratic Party has never stood for "special privileges." A cardinal principle of Jeffersonian Democracy is: "Equal rights to all and special privileges to none." It is upon this tower of Democracy I take my stand. We had as well vote to give the American shipowners $5,000,000 a year out of the Public Treasury as to vote to give them the revenues arising from the use of the canal. There is no difference, to my mind, in the principle.

I took this same position when this matter was before the House in 1912. I then followed the able chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Hon. WILLIAM C. ADAMSON, and voted for tolls upon all ships, except vessels owned by our Government, and I shall vote the same way now.

In addition to the reasons I have given, the act sought to be repealed is in violation of our foreign treaty relations. We solemnly entered into these foreign agreements. We should keep faith with the nations of the earth and maintain our dignity and national honor as a great world power.

I fully agree with the view of our able and patriotic President and other great men of the country that "free tolls" is a contravention of our international treaty agreements, especially with Great Britain. Having made those treaties, it is our sacred duty to stand by them and protect from stain and suspicion the good name of our great country. We now have the confidence and respect of other nations of the world, and it should be our highest purpose to continue to merit and have their esteem and good will.

To wantonly violate our solemn treaties is calculated to involve our country in serious complications. International dealings are delicate relations.

Often the President is in possession of facts of a confidential character as the head of our Government in his dealings with other nations which can not be made public. We must assume from his message to Congress in this case that there are matters of a most delicate nature and of the gravest importance about which the President is advised and which he can not consistently make public. His short but most powerful message of March 5, 1914, on this subject is as follows:

> I have come to you upon an errand which can be very briefly performed, but I beg that you will not measure its importance by the number of sentences in which I state it. No communication I have addressed to the Congress carried with it graver or more far-reaching implications as to the interest of the country, and I come now to speak upon a matter with regard to which I am charged in a peculiar degree, by the Constitution itself, with personal responsibility.
> I have come to ask you for the repeal of that provision of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, which exempts vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States from payment of tolls, and to urge upon you the justice, the wisdom, and the large policy of such a repeal with the utmost earnestness of which I am capable.
> In my own judgment, very fully considered and maturely formed, that exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view, and is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal concluded on November 18, 1901. But I have not come to urge upon you my personal views. I have come to state to you a fact and a situation. Whatever may be our own differences of opinion concerning this much-debated measure, its meaning is not debated outside the United States. Everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal. We consented to the treaty; its language we accepted; if we did not originate it; and we are too big, too powerful, too self-respecting a nation to interpret with a too strained or refined reading the words of our own promises just because we have power enough to give us leave to read them as we please. The large thing to do is the only thing we can afford to do—a voluntary withdrawal from a position everywhere questioned and misunderstood. We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and for the redemption of every obligation without quibble or hesitation.
> I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

This is one of the shortest, yet the fullest, most able, patriotic, and important messages that has ever been fashioned by the mind of any President.

Being a Democrat and in thorough accord with the great leader of my party, his request to me upon such a vital matter is a command which I could not ignore, even were I of the opposing belief on this question.

President Woodrow Wilson is the greatest man this country has known since Jefferson's time. We must concede to others what we would have them concede to us, and that is "honesty and sincerity of purpose." I am sure those making the fight for "free tolls" are honest in their convictions. Some, however, especially on the Republican side of the Chamber, have taken advantage of this opportunity to criticize and abuse our President and the administration. Certain "political pirates," "calamity howlers," and "chronic kickers" have sought to ridicule and condemn the President for his position on this matter. Such attacks remind one of a sparrow measuring size and wings with an eagle.

Grant, for the sake of the argument, that the President has "changed front" on this matter. It simply illustrates what the people knew of him before; that he, unlike many of his critics, is big enough and broad enough to change his mind when he finds he is wrong. It may be surprising to some politicians and to many of his critics that he is so big and strong, but it is not startling to the American people who know, honor, and love our President, because of his loyalty to duty and right. A man more patriotic or more thoroughly consecrated to duty and to the country's welfare never lived than Woodrow Wilson. Wisdom, conscience, and patriotism have shown him the right; and strong, true man that he is, in the face of criticism, he is doing his duty by the American people and is calling upon Congress to do its sacred duty in this matter that is so vital not only to the country at this time but to our future greatness and happiness.

In all his great constructive policies I have stood by him and helped to make this Democratic administration a success. To-day I count it a privilege to join with him in this effort to protect our national honor. He has made an earnest appeal to us. Democrats should not turn a deaf ear to his call, which is the clarion call of right. What does the following language mean?

> I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

Is it for us, not in possession of the delicate and confidential facts of which he is no doubt possessed, to question what we should do when the President of our country makes such an appeal, which indicates that we are on the verge of serious conflict with one of the great powers of the world? If I entertained a contrary opinion, I would sacrifice personal pride of opinion in obedience to what is certainly the country's good. We should be men on occasions of this kind and rise above petty prejudices and petty politics.

We can not afford to entangle and embarrass our country in matters of so serious a nature with foreign powers. Such complications might involve us in an awful war. Our duty is plain. We must avoid trouble. It is easier to keep out of trouble than it is to get out of it once we are in it. We must at all times exhibit a spirit of fairness in this and all other matters that will command and perpetuate respect. We can win no higher position among the nations of the earth than to be known as the "just nation," always preferring peace to war. As has been truly and ably said by my colleague and friend from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON]:

> About honor and virtue there can be no debate.

Every loyal Democrat should rally to the President's aid, and uphold him in this as well as the other great fights he is making for the people against the "special interests."

Democratic promises have been converted into Democratic performances. We have passed more remedial and constructive legislation in the interest of the masses in the short time we have been in power than any administration since the War between the States. The administration's record is "a record of achievement." Our President has led the fight in these battles that mean so much to the people. He is the leader of our party in this fight, and there should be but one side—the side of right, the side of the masses—for Democratic Representatives on this question.

The President's wisdom might sometimes be questioned, but no man should question his honesty, his sincerity, his patriotism, or his consecration to duty. In this matter he is right, and right should prevail.

Mr. ELDER. Mr. Speaker, I shall devote the most of my time to giving reasons why I think this bill charging tolls to the coastwise vessels of the United States going through the Panama Canal is wrong, and then I shall take a portion, in concluding my remarks, in giving my reason for voting to charge tolls to these coastwise vessels. In the first place, it is no gain to the Government to charge tolls to American coastwise ships, for the reason that as an economic principle these freight charges are ultimately paid by the consumer, who in this case will be the American people. So, while the toll money from this trade will go into the Treasury, it would be entirely paid by the consumers of the country and not the ship interests. That view only affects the portion of freight which will travel from coast to coast by sea. It does not take into consideration the larger and greater amount of freight which will be hauled by the transcontinental railroads of the country, and on this class of freight, of course, the Government will get no money, yet the railroads will exact an additional amount of freight charge for each ton hauled equal to such as may be charged by the Government as a toll through the Panama Canal. In this way the railroads, without paying anything to the Government as tolls, will take additional millions of money from the consumers of the country. This bill can be of benefit to no one except these railroads, in that it will permit them to charge higher freight rates than would otherwise be possible. Let us take an example: Suppose the railroad freight rate from New Orleans to San Francisco is $30 per ton. Suppose the ships on the completion of the canal could haul this freight at a profit to themselves for $20 per ton, which would be $10 lower than the railroads are now charging. Suppose the Government should lay a toll through the canal of $10 per ton—and if we charge $1 we can charge $10—the ships, of course, could not afford to haul for $20, for at that rate they were really operating at only a reasonable profit, and, necessarily, they must charge $10 more per ton, making their charge for hauling, under the $10 toll rate, $30 per ton. If no tolls had been charged, the railroads would have been compelled to reduce their rate from $30 to $20 a ton, but a kind and beneficent Government, after having spent $400,000,000 in building the canal in order to reduce freight rates and make transportation cheaper, has added a sufficient toll through this $400,000,000 canal so that now the railroads will not be forced to reduce their freight rates to meet the water competition. The result is that the Government will get a few million dollars in tolls, which will be paid by the consumers of its own country, with no gain to the Government, and, on the other hand, these same consumers will pay on the large amount of transcontinental railroad traffic hundreds of millions of dollars that they would not otherwise be compelled to pay.

Some of you say that this is a subsidy; if not direct, then indirect. I do not believe that it is true, unless it is an indirect subsidy to these railroads. A subsidy means an advantage or bonus to one particular class. It is on the same theory that protection is given to certain manufactured articles. We have for years been building locks and dams, canals, deepening harbors, and so forth, at millions of dollars of expense, figuring that the money expended by the Government would be more than amply repaid in the lessened transportation charges to the consumers of the country. We do not charge the ships for coming into our harbors where we have expended money to deepen them. We do not charge the ships for going through our locks and dams where the Government has paid money to construct them. We do not charge ships for going through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, yet it was constructed at the Government's expense. There has never been a contention that it was a subsidy not to charge these ships for this particular service, but only enabled the ships to furnish cheaper transportation to the people of this country. We have always believed in free shipping. There is a provision in our last tariff act that was a ship subsidy, and to which I was opposed, for it did not cheapen transportation, but gave to American bottoms a special advantage in order that we might build up our merchant marine.

They also tell us that it is in conflict with the Hay-Pauncefote treaty between Great Britain and the United States. In my opinion this is not correct, for we only exempt our coastwise vessels or vessels hauling American goods from one point in the United States to another. Foreign vessels are prohibited from carrying this class of freight, and being prohibited it is perfectly natural they are not interested in such matters, and it can not be a discrimination against vessels of Great Britain, whether we do or do not charge those vessels tolls. If we should grant American bottoms an exemption in hauling goods from foreign shores to the United States by way of the Panama Canal, then it would be a discrimination against the ships of Great Britain; but being shut out of the coastwise trade they can not and should not be interested.

However, I do not have to rely on my own interpretation of the treaty. The Supreme Court of the United States in the interpretation of such matters, so far as we are concerned, is the last word on the subject; and in the case of Olsen against Smith, One hundred and ninety-fifth United States Reports, which was decided in 1904, a pilotage charge was laid on ships coming into the port of Galveston; and as the coastwise vessels of the United States were exempted from that pilotage charge, the vessel in question being a British vessel, the proposition was directly raised that it would be in conflict with this treaty, giving an advantage to the coastwise vessels of the United States. Justice White, now the Chief Justice, as the organ of the court in passing on this question, said:

> Nor is there merit in the contention that, as the vessel in question was a British vessel coming from a foreign port, the State laws concerning pilotage are in conflict with a treaty between Great Britain and the United States providing that "no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States." Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage, resulting from the law of the United States, nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law, concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of vessels of the United States in such trade. In substance the proposition but asserts that because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations, therefore there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even although such regulations apply without discrimination to all vessels engaged in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign.

This decision of the court was unanimous, and affirmed the judgment of the court below. However, in support of our contention we are not confined to our own Supreme Court. I take from the Washington Post of date March 7, 1914, the following:

> The London Law Review, the highest authority among British legal publications, concludes a 5,000-word analysis of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and of American rights in the Panama Canal with these words:
> "To sum up, it is reasonably arguable:
> "(a) That the United States can support its action on the precise words of the material articles of the treaty, that its case is strengthened by reference to the preamble and context, and that its case is difficult to challenge on ground of general justice;
> "(b) There is no international obligation to submit the construction of its legislative act to any process of arbitration; and
> "(c) That any aggrieved party has an appropriate and impartial and a competent tribunal in the Supreme Court of the United States."

The full article will be found in the London Law Review for November, 1912, volume 38, pages 1 to 34.

However, if there is a doubt or room for construction that we are violating our treaty obligations I lay down the following as propositions both of law and right:

First. That either party to a treaty has the right at any time it sees fit to withdraw from the treaty, and that if the contention is true that it was a violation of the treaty, Congress and the President in 1912 withdrew from the treaty and a new one should be formed.

Second. That having gone to the expense of building the canal, and being indorsed in our opinion by the Supreme Court of our country, it would be nothing but right and proper that we should exempt these coastwise vessels until the matter can be submitted to some international court of arbitration. The Supreme Court, so far as we are concerned, interprets our laws, and we should not more readily accept the interpretation of the English diplomats, with their interests at stake, than we should the opinion of our Supreme Court handed down years ago. This difference of opinion could be readily left to some international court of arbitration, and if the decision was against us, then abide by it.

Another proposition that confronted me in my study of this case was the platform of my party, adopted at Baltimore in 1912, and as the last expression on this question it was direct and to the point for free trade for coastwise vessels, and if we charge these coastwise vessels, we are going directly against this declaration in the platform. And as the President well said, in making a speech at Washington Park, N. J., August 15, 1912:

> Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means business. It means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest and honest men, who intend to do business along those lines and who are not waiting to see whether they can catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not. They know the American people are now taking notice in a way in which they never took notice before, and gentlemen who talk one way and vote another are going to be retired to very quiet and private retreat.

I dislike very much to disregard this platform, which is our bond and our pledge of faith to the American people, and only exceptional circumstances should ever justify men in doing so.

The President, in addressing Congress on the 5th of March, asked us to repeal the freight toll exemption for coastwise vessels on the ground that it was a mistaken economic policy; and, second, that it was in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal concluded on November 18, 1901. I do not agree with the President on either of these propositions, and as a Member of Congress, while I feel it my duty to give due weight to his opinion on any economic question, yet, if my judgment disagrees with his, I feel it my duty to depend on my own judgment in the matter. And this would apply whether it was an internal economic proposition or the interpretation of a treaty, where my facility for knowing the facts and figures would be the same as his.

I fear very much that this country under whatever party it may be, beginning with the domination of Mr. Roosevelt, has left the simple ways of democracy, and a representative government is fast approaching a government by one man, with a few bureaus under his charge. And if Congress, unhesitatingly, against their own reasoning and the consequences, always accepts the view of the President, whoever he may be, then that country is a republican form of government in name only and has become a monarchy, benevolent or not, depending on the character of the individual President. However, the President, under the Constitution, is peculiarly charged with the handling of diplomatic situations, and, naturally, a Member of Congress, such as I am, has no chance of knowing the diplomatic situation and of what is being done or what is expected to be done. In such matters I defer to the views and wishes of the President. I do not believe that our country has ever elected or will ever elect any man who is un-American or unpatriotic. The spot light on him previous to his election is too great not to uncover his faults. Therefore, when the President concluded his short address on the 5th of March in these words:

> I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

He intimates, in fact he says, that the diplomatic relations of the United States, with the handling of which he is charged, demand that this be done. I do not know. I have not the means of knowing whether it should be done or not. It is against the economic welfare of the United States; it is a violation of the platform of my party; yet as an American citizen and as a Member of Congress, wishing the happiness and prosperity of our people, and as he comes to us in a public way and says that our foreign relations demand that this be done, I can see but one course for us to follow, and that is to grant the President what he wishes, in order that he may know how to deal with other matters "of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence." To those of you who, of course, agree with him in your construction of the treaty, as well as with his economic theory, your course is easy. To such of you who think as I do, that it is wrong economically and a violation of our platform, the question is necessarily harder, yet for the good and welfare of our country there should be but one answer. The question has ceased to be an economic one; it has ceased to be an interpretation of a treaty; it has ceased to be a party question; but, to my mind, it becomes a patriotic one. Therefore I shall vote for the repeal of the bill which granted free tolls to the coastwise vessels of the United States.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I am authorized to yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. BELL].

Mr. BELL of California. Mr. Speaker, until quite recently the people of this Nation rested in what was supposed to be a real, but which has since proven to be a fancied, security in the matter of the exemption from tolls through the Panama Canal of American vessels engaged in the coastwise traffic. They were justified in the belief that after exhaustive and comprehensive debates in both Houses of Congress, followed by an overwhelming vote in its favor, and coupled with the strong platform declarations of the Democratic and Progressive Parties, this question had been definitely settled.

The unexpected and somewhat dramatic revival of this supposedly settled question led me to believe that some new and startling information or some stronger and more convincing arguments might be forthcoming on the part of gentlemen who were the proponents of this measure. I have listened attentively, expecting every moment to be thrilled by the startling disclosure of the real reason for the remarkable reversal of form exhibited by some eminent gentlemen who have heretofore expressed their own strong personal convictions on this subject. But, Mr. Speaker, I have listened in vain. I have noted, however, what appears to me to be a very cleverly planned system of coercion and specious pleading on the part of some of the principal advocates of this bill. This work has been apportioned, and to some of these gentlemen has been given the difficult task of trying to present arguments that would show that the treaty was being violated; to others has been assigned the embarrassing labor of supplying arguments that would furnish their Democratic colleagues with some reason or excuse for repudiating their platform declarations and campaign promises. One distinguished gentleman, listening to "his master's voice," brushed lightly over the subject of treaty violations and in a few gracefully worded mysterious sentences, which revealed absolutely nothing, hinted at the dire impending consequences that might follow should this un-American pro-British bill fail to pass. [Laughter and applause.]

Why, Mr. Speaker, if we were to take this gentleman's speech, with its veiled forebodings, seriously, one with a vivid imagination might soon expect to hear that Japan was bombarding the Pacific coast, that the port of New York was blockaded and fired upon by the British fleets, and that the other interested nations were engaged in the pleasant pastime of destroying our seaboard cities. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Speaker, when the patriotic American citizens of this Nation express their opinions at the polls they will resent the frantic appeals made by some of the proponents of this bill to repudiate their party platform and to preserve party solidarity by abjectly surrendering to foreign powers, forever, American rights in an American canal. [Applause.]

In an independent, noncontrolled legislative body the repeal of an important law is attended with many difficulties. The committee to which it is referred approaches its consideration with many embarrassing and disconcerting questions. What is the matter with the law to be repealed? Is not the law a beneficial one? And is it not in the interest of the people as a whole? Who are asking for this repeal and who are most interested? These and many other questions are asked by the committee and on the floor of the legislative body. Of course, there have been legislative bodies in which the repeal of important laws was a comparatively simple matter. I recall that during the thirty-seventh session of the Legislature of the State of California, in the year 1907, and for many years prior thereto, the Southern Pacific Railroad and its allied corporations were in full control of the legislative branch of the government, and the repeal of any existing law not entirely satisfactory to said Southern Pacific Railroad was the simplest procedure imaginable. When the orders were issued from the railroad headquarters in San Francisco, the legislative skids were greased, the machine—and there was a perfectly working machine—was oiled, and, without a hitch or jar, the measure went promptly on its passage. But that was before the progressive voters elected Hiram Johnson governor of California and began to save the Southern Pacific Railroad the trouble and expense of selecting their legislators for them, and of making and repealing their laws. And yet here in the National Capital the reading of a message of some 400 words, requiring the attention of both Houses of Congress for about five minutes, containing not a line or word of argument, is deemed by some to be a sufficient reason to repeal a provision for which they had previously voted and for which they stood pledged by party platform and campaign utterances.

Perhaps the impatience of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], when he scolded the House for consuming time in the legitimate discussion of the rivers and harbors appropriation bill, one of the most important measures to come before the House at this session, was prompted by the fear that he and some of his colleagues might have time to hear from their constituents in regard to the platform pledges which they had made during the campaign. And in the making of said pledges, perhaps these gentlemen felt justified in following the example of their candidate for President of the United States, who pointed out to an audience of about 2,500 farmers the advantage the tolls exemption would be in shipping their products to southern and Pacific coasts.

THE PRESIDENT CHANGES HIS MIND.

In this speech, delivered at Washington Park, N. J., and while campaigning for the highest office in the gift of the people, and presumably standing upon the platform of his party, Mr. Wilson said in part:

> One of the great objects in cutting that great ditch across the Isthmus of Panama is to allow farmers who are near the Atlantic to ship to the Pacific by way of the Atlantic ports. Now, at present there are no ships to do that; and one of the bills pending—passed, I believe, yesterday by the Senate as it had passed the House—provides for free tolls for American ships through that canal and prohibits any ship from passing through which is owned by any American railroad company.

You see the object of that, don't you? We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage to compete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent.

In this connection I will quote here the following application, filed by the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. with the Interstate Commerce Commission under the provisions of section 5 of the act to regulate commerce, as amended:

Docket No. 6605. Application of the Southern Pacific Co. states that it owns 110,800 shares out of a total of 200,000 shares of the capital stock of the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. This steamship company owns and operates steamships plying between San Francisco, Cal., and Hawaii and the Orient, and between San Francisco and Balboa, on the west coast of the Isthmus of Panama, and intermediate ports in the Republics of Mexico and Central America. It asks authority to continue the operation of such lines.

This conclusively shows that the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. is already knocking at the gates of the canal in the hope that they may compete with themselves, as the President so aptly pointed out in his speech, above quoted, and it also conclusively shows that Mr. Wilson had been closely studying this subject.

This great railroad company thoroughly understands the advantage of competing with itself, not only in the State of California but in other States of the Union, as is evidenced by the number of applications filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission touching its steamship lines, which parallel by water its own railroad lines, and enabling it by juggling rates on land and water to crush out any important competitor in the transportation business.

THE CONSUMER PAYS THE TOLLS.

The fundamental purposes which lay behind the granting of exemption from canal tolls to American coasting vessels were:

1. To restrain exorbitant freight charges of transcontinental railroads.

2. To secure reasonable transportation charges by connecting the American coast liners on both the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans with an all-water carrying service.

3. To encourage shipping and shipbuilding, which greatly need encouragement in this country.

The exemption of American vessels engaged in coastwise traffic from tolls—and under the law no other nation can engage in such traffic—will not be in the nature of a subsidy, as has been so frantically claimed by the proponents of this repeal measure. On the contrary, it will be a direct saving to the ultimate consumer. Should our vessels be required to pay tolls in passing through the canal in their coastwise traffic, this item will simply be charged by said companies as purely an item of operating expenses. They will naturally add the tolls to their freight rate, and the shipper will have no choice but to pay it, and then, of course, this extra charge will be paid by the consignee. And it naturally follows that the transcontinental railway rates will be boosted the exact amount of the canal tolls imposed on vessels in the coastwise and coast-to-coast trade. Thus it will be seen that instead of lowering the cost of living, as was promised by the Democratic tariff bill, which promise has signally failed in its fulfillment, the imposition of tolls for our American vessels will add this extra item to the already high cost of living. Not only will the repeal of the tolls-exemption clause strike a deadly blow at American shipping, but it will add this extra charge to the exchange of products between the Southern and Eastern States and those of the Pacific coast. This is utterly inconsistent with the broad American policy of America for Americans. The enormous expense of constructing the canal, aside from its military aspect, is justified only by reason of the fact that it will be of direct benefit to the producers and consumers of American products.

BROKEN PLATFORM PLEDGES.

The President is now reported as stating, in order to bolster up his un-American appeal to Congress, that a majority of the Democratic Members of the House voted against the free-tolls clause at the time of its passage, and yet with that knowledge in the possession—or, at least, at the command—of the Democratic committee on resolutions, the following strong plank was written into the Baltimore platform:

We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal. We also favor legislation forbidding the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned or controlled by railroad carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal.

In Mr. Wilson's speech before referred to he made specific reference to that plank, saying, "Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means business. It means what it says." In the light of what has since transpired and of his present attitude, we must agree that the platform was not made to catch flies. Perhaps it was intended to catch votes, and it probably did catch many thousands of voters who were not Democrats but who favored the exemption of American vessels from canal tolls. This pledge was made to secure those votes, and was an expression of the intention of the party leaders at a time when the question was fully understood.

It is a little bit difficult for some of us to understand why the President, when a delegation of working girls and women personally plead with him to advocate the cause of equal suffrage, stated that he was wholly bound by the platform of the Democratic Party; that he could not ask his party to do something not specifically set out in such platform; and yet he is now asking his party to repudiate the plank in that platform which declared for freedom from tolls for American coastwise vessels.

NO VIOLATION OF TREATY.

If the President and the Democratic Party intend to yield to the unjust demand of Great Britain and discriminate against our own people in favor of foreign nations, they should at least be frank and open and not try to deceive themselves and their constituents by prating about treaty contravention and national dishonor.

That part of the treaty which England and the proponents of this repeal measure claim is violated is as follows:

The canal shall be free and open to vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality with the vessels of the United States.

We have not violated this provision by exempting our coastwise vessels. The main purpose of the legislation was to reduce the cost of domestic transportation. Cheap water transportation, as everybody knows, will compel the competing transcontinental railroads to maintain reasonable rates. This is purely a question of domestic policy, does not extend to foreign commerce, and has no relation whatever to international obligations.

It must be remembered that at the time this treaty was negotiated it was for the purpose of facilitating the construction of the canal on territory which was then foreign soil, but which has since been annexed by the United States. The object sought to be accomplished by the above provision was that the canal when constructed should not be used to give the vessels of one nation any advantage over those of any other nation in commerce between nations; that is, it was intended to prohibit discriminations and distinctions between vessels of different countries engaged in world commerce. But the coastwise traffic of the United States is confined solely to American vessels, and was so limited at the time the treaty was signed. No foreign vessels can engage in coastwise trade in the United States. It is therefore manifestly impossible to discriminate by tolls exemption or otherwise against ships of foreign nations in traffic from which they are absolutely excluded. No foreign nation had a right to interfere in our coastwise trade before the signing of the treaty, and it certainly can not now be argued that that right has been acquired through a treaty which had for its very purpose the preservation of the conditions existing at that time.

England herself, under a similar act passed in 1815 guaranteeing equality to the ships of the United States in the harbors of Great Britain, has discriminated since that time against our vessels and in favor of her local shipping. A treaty between the United States and Great Britain, ratified in 1815, contains the following clause:

No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

Notwithstanding this provision, American overseas vessels have been charged and are now charged high rates while English coastwise vessels are charged low rates, and there has been no complaint made on the part of America. In other words, Great Britain, by this practice extending over nearly 100 years, and acquiesced in by the United States, clearly shows that she does not understand that her local affairs, her coastwise concerns, were in any sense the subject of international contract.

We of the Pacific coast are vitally interested in this question. We are not so un-American as to want to turn over our splendid markets to foreign manufacturers and producers. We believe that the chief advantages and benefits of the Panama Canal, built by American brains and paid for out of the pockets of American taxpayers, should come to American industries, American shipping, and American labor. We have looked forward to the construction of this waterway in the belief that it would reduce the exorbitant freight rates between Pacific and Atlantic ports, and thus furnish a cheaper exchange of the products of our great Pacific coast with those of the Atlantic seaboard. The exemption of tolls in our coastwise traffic is purely a question of the regulation of domestic commerce, and is obviously in the interest of the whole American people.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MANAHAN].

Mr. MANAHAN. Mr. Speaker, Why is my time so limited that all I can do is to put a few questions to the advocates of this bill?

Why this unseemly haste in forcing this measure through the House?

Do the advocates of the repeal fear full debate?

Do they fear some foreign nation?

Or are they afraid of a protest from the people?

Are the people yet awake to the meaning of this contest?

Do they realize that it is the last desperate effort of the great railroads to maintain control of transportation and to hold the power of levying unreasonable freight-rate taxes upon them?

Is it not clear that in demanding the repeal of the exemption of tolls on our coastwise shipping England is acting as attorney for the Canadian Pacific Railroad?

Do not my colleagues from the Northwest realize that in pleading for England's view of the treaty they are rendering valuable service to the royal house of Hill in Minnesota? [Applause.]

Is there a Member of this House or a voter in this country so simple as to think that the railroads are indifferent in this matter?

Does not the elimination of water competition mean millions in railroad dividends?

Does not my colleague [Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota] realize that water competition reaches to the very heart of this country—to Winona, St. Paul, Minneapolis, and Duluth, by way of the Mississippi and the Great Lakes?

Is he in earnest when he says that the railroad rates can not be reduced to any extent by free tolls because the revenues of the railroads will not permit such reduction?

Does he not know that a large part of the railroads' revenues is used in permanent betterments and in paying dividends on watered stock?

Is it possible that he stands squarely in favor of maintaining present excessive railroad rates in the Northwest?

Is not this the railroads' fight under cover of England and diplomacy?

Why do not these great transportation companies fight in the open?

Why do they and their newspapers raise a false issue and seek to intimidate Members of Congress to vote for this bill by charging them with dishonor if they do otherwise?

Is not the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States holding that this treaty did not apply to domestic shipping a complete answer to the charge of dishonor in exempting our coastwise trade?

As the true American policy demands absolute supremacy over the Panama Canal, is it dishonorable to defend this American policy against the British policy?

Who owns the Panama Canal Zone?

Who built that great ditch?

Who is entitled to the profits—all the profits—of that great enterprise?

Do my colleagues think that the profits of the canal to the Nation will be measured by the tolls collected?

Is it not clear that the great advantage will come in lowering the cost of living by developing water transportation everywhere to compete with the railroads and to cut down the excessive overburden of freight-rate taxes?

Will you vote for the British policy against the American policy; for the railroads against the consumers of this country?

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH.]

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the Sims bill, because I believe that it involves the surrender and betrayal of the most important rights of ownership of the United States in the Panama Canal.

This question involves the construction of section 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

Neither England nor her staunchest supporters here have as yet dared to claim that the provision that the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality applies to the United States. Up to the present time it has not been asserted, so far as vessels of war are concerned, that the United States is included within the term "all nations." Yet it is maintained that, in respect to vessels of commerce, the United States is included within that term. If this country surrenders, so far as vessels of commerce are concerned, the position this Government has heretofore taken respecting both vessels of war and commerce we place ourselves in a position, if we be consistent, where it becomes incumbent upon us to open up the canal to vessels of war of all nations on terms of entire equality with those of our own country. There is absolutely no difference. The situation is identical. The words of the treaty are "the vessels of war and commerce of all nations observing these rules." If the United States is included within the term "all nations" with respect to vessels of commerce, it is included within that term respecting vessels of war.

When taken in connection with the other provisions of the treaty providing for the construction of the canal by the United States, the enjoyment of all the rights incident to such construction as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal, I can come to but one conclusion, namely, that the term "all nations" in the provision in question does not and was never intended or understood by the makers of the treaty to include the United States. The provision is simply a guaranty by the United States, as the owner, constructor, and operator of the canal, to show no favoritism or partiality to one foreign nation over any other as to conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise, and that such conditions and charges of traffic will be just and equitable.

As to the equity and justice of the charges of traffic, it is sufficient to say that in fixing them not only was the probable foreign shipping passing through the canal taken into consideration but the coastwise shipping was also considered, and the rates were fixed on such a basis that neither England nor any other nation is required to pay greater tolls than it would if the coastwise shipping were also charged with tolls. The charge fixed of $1.20 per ton is less than that charged in the Suez Canal, though the cost of construction and maintenance and the difficulties overcome in the Panama Canal are many times as great as those in the Suez. The rates fixed are not only equal for all other nations of the world, but the United States has imposed equal rates on its own merchant marine except as to those vessels engaged in the coastwise trade and its vessels of war. No country, therefore, has any complaint on this score.

Whatever our rights with respect to giving preference to our vessels engaged in foreign commerce may be, we have not attempted to exercise any such right. We have simply exempted from the payment of tolls our vessels engaged in the coastwise trade.

As to this class of vessels the position taken by the United States in granting free tolls to its coastwise vessels has been steadfastly maintained by England for nearly a hundred years.

The treaty of 1815 provides:

> That no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed * * * in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

England never construed the words "British vessels" and "vessels of the United States" as used in that treaty as including coasting vessels, but always differentiated in favor of her own coasting vessels. If you will apply this same construction to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, it is obvious that by England's own construction, adhered to for a hundred years, the equality clause does not relate to the vessels of the United States engaged in the coastwise trade.

The Supreme Court of the United States has passed on this very question in the case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 344), decided in 1904. The second article of the treaty of 1815 reads as follows:

> No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States, nor in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

This second article of the treaty of 1815 was under consideration. The court in rendering its decision said:

> Nor is there merit in the contention that as the vessel in question was a British vessel, coming from a foreign port, the State laws concerning pilotage are in conflict with a treaty between Great Britain and the United States providing that no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States. Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage resulting from the law of the United States nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by State law concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemption does not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in such trade. In substance the proposition but asserts that because of the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations; therefore there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even although such regulations apply without discrimination to all vessels in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign.

In effect, the Supreme Court said:

What we do or omit to do with regard to our coastwise trade is of no concern to any nation, for they can not complain with regard to a traffic in which they have no interest. No regulation, exemption, or privilege which we see fit to grant to our coastwise trade is a just subject of complaint, for it does not concern vessels engaged in the foreign trade.

While this decision would, of course, not be binding on England, the fact that she acquiesced in that decision, and has herself followed the same practice for a hundred years, convinces me that the position heretofore taken by the United States is right.

That England herself doubted her right to object to the exemption of vessels engaged in the coastwise trade is apparent from the language in the first British note dated July 8, 1912:

If the trade could be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic which is reserved for United States vessels could be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken.

In his message, delivered to Congress urging the repeal of the exemption clause, President Wilson stated that in his judgment—

The exemption was in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal, concluded November 18, 1901.

In view of this statement by the President, the passage of this bill will be a public surrender by the Nation of its right, heretofore maintained, to exempt its coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls. If we are consistent, the next step will be the surrender of our right, which has heretofore been upheld, of giving preference to our own vessels of war in times of war and peace. If we follow this same line of reasoning, our action in fortifying the canal is in plain violation of the treaty, and the next step that we will be asked to take will be the demolition of the fortifications. If such be the meaning of the terms of the treaty, the construction of the canal will be an actual detriment to us if we should be engaged in war. It would be better that the canal were never built if we have not the right to exercise sovereignty over it.

The canal was built by the American people, on American soil, at a cost of $375,000,000, not 1 cent of which has been contributed by any other country in the world. This is an expenditure of $4 for every man, woman, and child in the country; and we are charged with the upkeep and maintenance of the canal. If we accept the contention of those favoring the repeal, we have no rights, privileges, immunities, or exemptions arising out of the construction of the canal other than those enjoyed by "all nations." And, for one, I am not willing to place such a reflection upon the intelligence and patriotism of three Presidents, the State Department, and the Senate of the United States.

The President has asked us to repeal the toll-exemption clause for the purpose of setting our country right in the eyes of the world, regardless of whether the American contention is right or wrong. I do not believe that my constituents want me, for the sake of gaining favor for my country with the world, to place them in a position of asserting that our country's action has been dishonorable when they believe the action taken was wise, just, and honorable. It is our duty to be just before we are generous. There are other ways of settling this question than to take the position that our acts as a Nation have been dishonorable.

While a great deal of mystery surrounds the attempt to force this repeal measure through Congress, I wish it to be understood that I have the highest regard for the President, and would be glad to assist in anything he might request—as I have done on several other occasions—if I were not so thoroughly convinced that this proposed action is against the best interests of the United States and against the wishes of a majority of the people I have the honor to represent. This is an occasion where party advantage or mere local interest should be subordinated to the higher ideals of patriotism and national honor. [Applause.]

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SCOTT].

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, on the 5th day of the present month the President, in pursuance of that provision of the Constitution which directs that he shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient, appeared personally before the two Houses of Congress jointly assembled, and delivered a most extraordinary message upon a very important subject. The President did not on that occasion give to the Congress any considerable information of the state of the Union, and it would be inexact to say that he recommended to their consideration any measure judged necessary or expedient. The President, without conveying to Congress any information upon the state of the Union, and not satisfied to recommend for consideration, asks with a directness calculated to eliminate discretion the repeal of an act of Congress touching a matter of great and fundamental importance.

Touching the exigency which has impelled the President to this recourse, he said that no communication addressed by him to the Congress had carried with it graver or more far-reaching implications, and he referred to it as a matter with regard to which he was charged in a peculiar degree, by the Constitution itself, with personal responsibility.

As to the gravity of the implications attending the matter, the subject of the President's remarks, our opinions will differ, and they well may, at least until we have been taken more openly into the confidence of those whose positions and opportunities have given them more intimate knowledge of the situation. As to the matter in question being one with regard to which the President is charged by the Constitution with personal responsibility, we must also be permitted to form our own opinions.

The Congress is asked to repeal that provision of the Panama Canal act which exempts vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States from the payment of tolls. The request so urgently made is accompanied by the expression of judgment that the provision for such exemption embodies a mistaken economic policy. We are also told that the provision referred to is in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal, concluded November 19, 1901.

As to whether the provision of the law exempting from the payment of tolls our vessels engaged in coastwise trade embodies a mistaken economic policy, there is no doubt a wide difference of opinion among our citizens. That question is one which the American people must settle for themselves, and, like all other great debatable questions of domestic concern, should be settled in accordance with the expressed will of our majorities. Moreover, it should be settled by the American people alone without the insidious influence of foreign implications, and at such time as best suits our convenience and judgment. Personally I do not believe that the United States is ready to definitely decide upon and foreclose the economic question.
